PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 76th CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE

MONDAY, APRIL 24, 1939

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord of our life, star of our night, Thou hope of every nation: Make us to understand more clearly day by day that life has no more to give than the opportunity of loving service, that infinite pity is needed for the infinite pathos of the world, and that we cannot touch our neighbor's heart with anything less than our own.

Inspire us with the passion of a larger claim than we have ever known, that we may breathe the world thought, do the world deed, and, linking our hopes to humankind, we may become such channels of good will and understanding among the nations that, with evil thoughts assuaged, men may find peace on earth, and, after they have striven, may find peace in Thy heaven. We ask it in our Saviour's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Thursday, April 20, 1939, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE DURING ADJOURNMENT

Under authority of the order of the 20th instant,

On April 21, 1939, the following message was received by the Secretary of the Senate from the House of Representatives: That the House agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4278) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes; and that the House agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 14) requesting the return from the President, and authorizing the reenrollment of, Senate bill 828 concerning auxiliary naval vessels.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also communicated the intelligence that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 518. An act to provide for the further development of cooperative agricultural extension work;

H. R. 899. An act to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station on the east coast of the Keweenaw Peninsula, Mich.;

Mr. LEE. I announce that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] are engaged in the performance of duty as members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy and, therefore, are absent from the Senate today.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART] are detained on important public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I have the honor and the privilege to announce to the Senate that the Honorable JAMES M. SLATTERY, recently appointed by the Governor of Illinois to succeed the late James Hamilton Lewis as United States Senator from that State, is in the Senate Chamber and prepared to take the oath.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The credentials of the Senator-designate have heretofore been presented. If the Senator-designate will present himself at the desk, the oath will be administered to him.

Mr. SLATTERY, escorted by Mr. LUCAS, advanced to the Vice President's desk, and, the oath of office having been administered to him by the Vice President, he took his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

REENROLLMENT OF SENATE BILL 828—AUXILIARY NAVAL VESSELS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate of April 20, 1939 (the House of Representatives concurring), I return herewith the enrolled bill (S. 828) to permit the President to acquire and convert, as well as to construct, certain auxiliary vessels for the Navy.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 24, 1939.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS, PORTLAND, OREG., AND AKRON, OHIO

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting drafts of proposed legislation to authorize the disposal of the Portland, Oreg., old courthouse building and to repeal the minimum-price limitation on sale of the Akron, Ohio, old post-office building and site, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REGULATION OF VESSELS ON NAVIGABLE WATERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Assistant Secretary of Commerce, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend laws for preventing collisions of vessels, to regulate equipment of certain motorboats on the navigable waters of the United States, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EMPLOYMENT OF ALIENS BY TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the general manager of the Tennessee Valley Authority, transmitting, in response to Senate Resolution 285, agreed to June 8, 1938, an additional report as to the number of aliens employed by the Authority, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TRAFFIC ACT OF 1925

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the District of Columbia Traffic Act of 1925, by providing that operators of Federal Government-owned vehicles stationed outside of the District of Columbia shall not be required to have operators' permits while operating such vehicles within the District, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR LEWIS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Texas, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas there has been called from the walks of life and the councils of men one of the Nation's most brilliant and outstanding men, Senator J. HAMILTON LEWIS, of Illinois, whose life typifies that of a real American in that he struggled as a young man as a longshoreman of the Seattle docks, and by his courage, his alert mind, and his statesman policies fought his way to one of the most powerful positions in the Government of the United States; and

Whereas he served in the Congress of the United States from the State of Washington and later he served in the Senate from the great State of Illinois during the Woodrow Wilson administration, and later he was returned to the Senate in 1930 and also reelected in 1936, and he was serving in that distinguished body at the time of his death; and

Whereas in his last speech in the Senate of the United States, delivered January 25, 1939, he summarized in his brilliant and characteristic manner the thought that now dwells in the minds of millions of the citizens of this Republic, when he said: "There is only one course for America, to obey the law. Far from removing the embargo, our course should be to tighten it. Let us not allow people interested in one side or the other to draw us into a war that would be another World War"; and

Whereas, while he served in the Senate of the United States as Democratic whip for that body and as one of the leaders of the Democratic Party, he provided wise counsel for said party and his country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of Texas, That we do regret the passing of this great and brilliant statesman, we know his place will be difficult to fill, that we express our heartfelt sympathy to his family and friends; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the members of his family and a copy to the President of the United States Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Concurrent Resolution 22

Concurrent resolution memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to rehabilitate the Great Lakes cut-over area

Whereas the problems of unemployment and relief in Minnesota are especially acute in the sparsely settled areas of the north central and northeastern portions of the State, where the forests were formerly the great natural resource; and

Whereas the economic situation of this region has steadily become less favorable since the lumber industry passed its peak early in the century, culminating with the depression years since 1929; and

Whereas the relief measures undertaken during this depression period, though timely and effective for relief, are not designed to achieve substantial and permanent rehabilitation of the region which will make it self-supporting to the same degree as other portions of the State; and

Whereas such rehabilitation is in the interest of the Nation as a whole as well as the State and the region itself; and

Whereas the President of the United States, through the National Resources Committee, has directed that an "economic survey for the Great Lakes cut-over area" be made, such area consisting of large areas in the northern portions of the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, as well as Minnesota; and

Whereas through such direction the Northern Great Lakes Regional Committee of Sixteen has been set up, consisting of four members from each State and four Federal representatives, and such committee has been working diligently for 8 months in making plans for the rehabilitation of the region in collaboration with more than a hundred associates selected for their special knowledge of conditions in the region, such associates being in part scientists connected with the universities of the three States, in part Federal, State, and local officials, and in part leading citizens from the three States; and

Whereas the report of the Northern Lakes States Regional Committee, outlining a plan for such rehabilitation, which is nearing completion and about to be published and issued by the National Resources Committee, recommends a program for rehabilitation based on the encouragement of agriculture in the region through aids and measures which will tend to stimulate individual self-help and initiative, the restoration of the original great forest resource both for its own sake and as a means of providing useful employment within the region during the period of rehabilitation, the more extensive development of the recreational possibilities, and the utilization of all industrial opportunities; and

Whereas it appears that such a program embodies the considered opinion of those who have been most intimately concerned with the problems of the region, with many years of experience, and is capable of making progress toward the complete rehabilitation which is necessary, and will be effective if persevered in; and

Whereas the report recommending such a program is the direct result of the expressed direction of the President of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Minnesota (the house of representatives concurring), That this Legislature of Minnesota memorialize the President and Congress of the United States to take cognizance of the report of the Northern Lakes States Regional Committee and to enact such legislation, supported by adequate financial provisions, as may be necessary to aid the State and local governments and the people of the region in rehabilitating the Great Lakes cut-over area; be it further

Resolved, That attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress, to each Member in Congress from the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, to the Governors of such States, and to each house of the Legislatures of Michigan and Wisconsin.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Concurrent Resolution 21

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass legislation providing for cooperation by Federal and State agencies as to the necessary surveys and investigations for the proposed Mississippi River Parkway

Whereas the Mississippi River for nearly 400 years from the days of Indian trails and discovery routes has been used as a natural travel route of increasing historic, scenic, and general importance; and

Whereas interstate north and south travel trade from the 10 States bordering on the Mississippi River, containing approximately 30,000,000 people, constituting one-fourth of the population of the Nation, with over 5,000,000 passenger automobiles, is continually increasing, due to greater industrial leisure and tourist attractions; and

Whereas the recent creation of splendid lakes by construction of 26 locks and dams on the upper Mississippi River, the modernization of the levees along the river, and the great variety of its climate, agricultural, mineral, and industrial developments provide greater Nation-wide travel inducements than ever before along the Mississippi River; and

Whereas the demands and needs for a national park and rural trunk parkway through the Mississippi Valley with connections for future branch tributary valley parkways and public areas for recreational purposes as a part of the Nation-wide parkway system justify the authorization of this particular parkway as timely; and

Whereas it is proposed to construct this parkway from the source of the Mississippi River in Lake Itasca in Itasca State Park, Minn., to the mouth of the Mississippi in the Gulf of Mexico, and the State of Minnesota is, therefore, one of the terminals of the proposed parkway: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota (the senate concurring), That we respectfully urge and petition the Congress of the United States and President Franklin D. Roosevelt to pass legislation specifically known as H. R. 3759, providing for cooperation by Federal and State agencies as to the necessary surveys and investigations for such parkway; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State be instructed to send copies of this resolution to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, the Honorable JOHN GARNER, Vice President of the United States, the Honorable WILLIAM BANKHEAD, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of Minnesota in the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of Wisconsin, which were referred to the Committee on Finance:

Assembly Joint Resolution 12

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to amend the Social Security Act so as to repeal the maximum contribution of $15 for each old-age pensioner to the States

Whereas the Congress of the United States has enacted the Social Security Act providing for aid to the aged and other needy persons, and therein further provided for payments to the States of $15 for each aged person, conditioned upon the State's passing legislation conforming to the requirements of such act, and matching in proportion the required funds of the United States; and

Whereas these provisions afford a maximum sum of $30 for each old-age pensioner unless the State is willing to assume and pay the entire amount above the contribution of $15 of the United States; and

Whereas it is believed that this sum is inadequate for eligible persons in not permitting bare sustenance, and that the Federal Government should encourage the States to grant proper and sufficient aids for aged persons in accordance with American ideals and American standards by matching the contributions of the State without limitation as to amount; and

Whereas the aged people should be enabled to live in decency and health and be relieved of their fears and miseries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to amend the Social Security Act by removing the limitation of $15 for each such aged person as the maximum Federal contribution so as to enable the Federal Government to match any contribution of a State without restriction as to amount; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

Assembly Joint Resolution 18

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact legislation removing the reciprocal exemption from tax on income of municipal, State, and Federal employees

Whereas the reciprocal-tax exemption claimed by and granted to employees of the municipal, State, and Federal Governments was formerly an inequity of no great importance as their numbers and salaries were then relatively small; but with the astonishing increase in the vast army of such employees with an estimated income in excess of $3,000,000,000 such tax exemption has become an alarming defect in the fiscal system of our governmental units which have increasingly relied upon graduated income taxes for their revenues; and

Whereas the reciprocal exemption of salaries of governmental employees has created a vast reservoir of tax-exempt income in the possession of people who should equitably bear their just proportion of governmental expenses and relief costs; and

Whereas the removal of such exemptions should produce much added and needed income on the basis of present tax laws to both State and Federal Governments; and

Whereas the time has come in a democracy that those people who obtain their livelihood from the Government should receive the same treatment as those working for private employers, and should be terminated as a matter of principle and not of politics; and

Whereas the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, approved in 1913, expressly authorized the Congress of the United States "to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived," should now authorize the taxation of all income derived from municipal, State, and Federal Governments: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation removing the reciprocal-tax exemption on Government salaries of all kinds, and conferring powers on the State with respect to Federal salaries and powers to the Federal Government with respect to State and local governmental salaries; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to both Houses of Congress, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following communication and resolution of the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF PUERTO RICO,
San Juan, P. R., April 15, 1939.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
President of the Senate, Congress of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The House of Representatives of Puerto Rico approved today, by unanimous vote, the following resolution, introduced by the Speaker, Hon. Miguel A. García Méndez:

"Resolution requesting from the Congress of the United States of America the appropriation of sufficient funds to establish a tropical forest experiment station in the island of Puerto Rico

"Whereas the Congress and the President of the United States of America, through the passage and approval of the McSweeney-McNary Act of May 1928 (Public, No. 466, 70th Cong.), authorized the establishment of a tropical forest experiment station in the West Indies;

"Whereas such a forest experiment station would fill a distinct need and would prove to be a valuable supplement to the Federal and insular government agencies now engaged in working on agricultural and land-use problems in Puerto Rico;

"Whereas the original forests of Puerto Rico have long ago disappeared and the government of Puerto Rico is now engaged in reforestation on a large scale;

"Whereas a forest experiment station would materially assist in solving a critical and imminent problem now confronting the forest program of the island of Puerto Rico: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico, That the government of Puerto Rico thoroughly endorses the contemplated establishment and requests that the Congress of the United States of America will appropriate sufficient money during the present session of Congress, to insure the early establishment of such forest experiment station in the island."

Respectfully,

ANTONIO ARROYO, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Florida, favoring an immediate increase in the sugar quota allotment for Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See memorial printed in full when presented today by Mr. PEPPER.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a memorial of the Legislature of Florida, favoring the immediate enactment of House bill 2, a general-welfare bill providing old-age assistance, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See memorial printed in full when presented today by Mr. PEPPER.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, favoring continuation of the excise tax of 4 cents per pound on foreign-produced copper imported into the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. VANDENBERG.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Council of the City of Los Angeles, Calif., favoring the enactment of legislation to make funds available for, and extend the life of, the Federal Administration of Public Works, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of Columbia County (Oreg.) Grange Council, Patrons of Husbandry, favoring the prompt enactment of Senate bill 1108, prohibiting the exportation of peeler logs except by permission of the President, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of Francis Key Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics, No. 173, of Richmond, Ky., favoring the maintenance of the American school system—nonpartisan, nonsectarian, efficient, and democratic—and equal education and economic opportunities and advantages for all, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Third District Petroleum Industries Committee of Alabama, favoring termination of the 4 cents per gallon Federal lubricating-oil tax on June 30, 1939, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Bridgeport (Conn.) Council of Catholic Women, condemning war and its attendant propaganda, and urging that the Congress do not relinquish its constitutional rights pertaining to war and neutrality, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the thirty-ninth council of the Ohio Society, United States Daughters of 1812, favoring the deportation of all undesirable aliens illegally in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the States of Alabama, Nebraska, and New York, favoring the enactment of the so-called Wagner-Van Nuys-Capper antilynching bill, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Maryland Chapter, International Federation of Catholic Alumnae, favoring the return and stationing of the frigate Constellation at the port of Baltimore, Md., which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MEAD presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Buffalo, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of any neutrality legislation which might involve the United States in any foreign entanglement or war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a petition of sundry citizens (being apple, peach, and cherry growers and their employees) of the State of Maryland, praying for the enactment of the so-called Barden bill (H. R. 5374) amending the wage-hour law, and remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called Norton bill (H. R. 5435) to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (wage-hour law), which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of Mildred E. Becker and sundry other citizens of Baltimore, Md., praying for the enactment of neutrality legislation to keep America out of war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Niles, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of neutrality legislation, except that which will guarantee the absolute and unqualified neutrality of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying that the United States do not enter into foreign entanglements of any nature, and that immigration to the United States be stopped completely until such time as the unemployment problem may be solved, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of members of the Leslin Civic Study Club, of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying that so long as the United States shall adhere to the general policy as enunciated in the act of August 31, 1935, to retain on our statute books the further and corollary principle enunciated in the act of May 1, 1937, extending the act to include civil as well as international conflicts, and favoring an immediate investigation of leftist groups sponsoring propaganda favoring lifting the embargo on arms to countries engaged in war, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VANDENBERG also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

House Concurrent Resolution 20

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to extend the excise tax on copper

Whereas the Congress of the United States placed in the revenue bill of 1932 an excise tax of 4 cents per pound on foreign-produced copper; and

Whereas this act would have expired in June 1934 if it had not been extended for 1 year by Presidential proclamation; and

Whereas the same tax was included in the revenue bill of 1935, which expired in June 1937; and

Whereas the conditions prompting the enactment of the excise tax on copper in 1932 still exist today and will continue to exist, and the problem cannot be handled under the present policy of reciprocal tariffs; and

Whereas the copper industry is of great importance to the people of the Upper Peninsula, and of the people of the entire State of Michigan, in order to permit mines to maintain wage scales and standards of living necessary for our families; and

Whereas 7 years of operation of the excise tax on copper has proved the benefits of the measure: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Michigan Legislature respectfully urges the Congress of the United States to continue an excise tax of 4 cents per pound on foreign-produced copper imported into the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That suitable copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, and to the Michigan Members in the Senate and House of Congress.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 28

Whereas by section 610, title IV, of the Revenue Act of 1932, Congress placed a tax on firearms, shells, and cartridges; and

Whereas the Pittman-Robertson Act (Public, 415, 75th Cong.) authorized Congress to appropriate an amount equal to the revenue accruing from said tax on firearms, shells, and cartridges for Federal aid to the States for the restoration of wildlife; and

Whereas for the present fiscal year Congress appropriated $1,000,000 of the revenues accruing from said tax and has and is using said appropriation to aid the States in wildlife restoration; and

Whereas it is of the utmost importance that the program of wildlife restoration which has been inaugurated in this and other States under the terms of the Pittman-Robertson Act be carried forward without interruption and that the gains already made in wildlife restoration be not lost: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of Texas (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress be, and is hereby requested, to appropriate, as authorized by the Pittman-Robertson Act, the full amount of the tax imposed by section 610, title IV, of the Revenue Act of 1932, on firearms, shells, and cartridges, for carrying out the purpose of the act and enabling the States to restore their wildlife as contemplated under the provisions of this act; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the desire of the Texas Legislature that our United States Senators and our Representatives in the Congress support this item in the appropriation bill; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to send a copy of this resolution to our United States Senators and Representatives in the Congress.

Mr. SHEPPARD also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

House Concurrent Resolution 74

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill known as the truth in fabric, it being Senate bill No. 3502; and

Whereas, such bill is designed to protect producers, manufacturers, and consumers from the unrevealed presence of substitutes, and mixtures in spun, woven, knitted, or felted fabrics, and in garments or articles of apparel or other articles made therefrom; and

Whereas the enactment of such bill into law would be of great benefit to the public: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Texas respectfully urge the passage of this bill and that copies of this resolution be forwarded to United States Senators MORRIS SHEPPARD and TOM CONNALLY, and each member of the Texas delegation in the House of Representatives in Washington.

Mr. SHEPPARD also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Texas, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

House Concurrent Resolution 75

Whereas there is now pending in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States a bill known as the McCarran bill, being Senate bill No. 90 and House bill No. 951, which passed the Senate February 2, 1939; and

Whereas such bill makes it a crime to transport in interstate or foreign commerce any cattle, hogs, sheep, horses, or mules, their carcasses or hides, knowing them to have been stolen, or to receive or dispose of the same; and

Whereas the enactment of such bill into law would be of untold value to livestock raisers throughout these United States in curbing the theft of livestock: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Texas respectfully urge the passage of this bill, and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each member of the Texas delegation in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. PEPPER presented the following memorial of the Legislature of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

House Memorial 2

To the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, and the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Florida, in legislative session assembled, do most respectfully memorialize and petition your honorable bodies as follows:

Whereas thousands of our citizens are dependent upon agriculture pursuits for a livelihood; and

Whereas Florida soil and climate is especially well adapted to the growing of sugarcane; and

Whereas under the present quota we consume more than twice as much sugar as we are allowed to produce; and

Whereas Cuba's quota is over 28 percent and Florida's is less than 1 percent; and

Whereas the rights of citizens of the United States who live in the sovereign State of Florida should not be curtailed in favor of any foreign nation; and

Whereas an increase in the amount of the sugar quota would be a great blessing to the people of Florida: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Florida, do respectfully memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States to immediately increase the sugar quota allotment for Florida; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be immediately transmitted to the President of the United States and the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to each Senator and Representative in the United States Congress from the State of Florida.

Mr. PEPPER also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 8

Whereas the pine belt of the South has been developed into one of the main sources of wood pulp in North America; and

Whereas a great portion of the State of Florida is within the pine belt and there has been attracted to the region large investments for the purpose of processing southern pine into wood pulp; and

Whereas the wood-pulp industry in Florida and the United States has been adversely affected by the recent change in the relation between the British, Swedish, and Finnish moneys and the American dollar; and

Whereas the foreign wood-pulp producers have obtained thereby an advantage over American producers of wood pulp in the United States market; and

Whereas by reason of the advantage of foreign producers of wood pulp over American producers of wood pulp the demand for American-produced wood pulp has declined drastically for the past several months and workers in American wood pulp producing mills find their income either reduced or cut off entirely; and

Whereas the Federal Government could rectify this unfortunate condition by means at their disposal: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house concurring), That Congress be requested to invoke such monetary clauses in the British, Swedish, and Finnish trade agreements as may be necessary to protect the American wood-pulp industry as well as other industries in competition with goods imported from the said countries, and to take cognizance of the plight of American wood-pulp producers; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be dispatched immediately upon its passage to each member of the Florida delegation in Congress for their earnest consideration.

Mr. PEPPER also presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

House Joint Memorial 1

To the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United State, and the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Florida, in legislative session assembled, do most respectfully memorialize and petition your honorable bodies as follows:

Whereas millions of our elderly citizens who have served their country in peace or war during the period of their natural working lives are now spending their last days in poverty and misery, dependent upon public or private charity or their relatives; and

Whereas social security has become the dominant question before the American people; and, therefore, justice and the public welfare demand that ample provision be made for the health and support of these elderly citizens; and

Whereas security for the aged is a national rather than a State or local problem, which cannot be solved by a miscellany of conflicting State laws, imposing unequal burdens of taxation, and subject to continued changes, but can be adequately solved only by a uniform basic law, national in scope, which will insure to the aged citizens of each State equal protection with those in every other State; and

Whereas it is the consensus of opinion among leading economists that the depression through which we are passing is due to lack of purchasing power by the people and that balancing the ability of consumers to buy with the productive power of industry is essential to complete and permanent national recovery; and

Whereas the only feasible plan that has been proposed to solve the above-stated situation is the General Welfare Act of 1937, known as bill H. R. 2 and now pending before Congress, which provides a Federal Government tax levy of 2 percent upon the fair gross dollar value of each transaction done within the United States and Territories, the proceeds therefrom to be equitably distributed among our citizens of age 60 or more, on the condition that the same be expended within a period of 30 days; and

Whereas such a transaction tax imposed by the Federal Government will be equal and uniform in the several States and based upon the ability to pay; and

Whereas this proposed plan does not ask the Federal Government to issue any interest-bearing bonds, or to borrow any money or to assume any definite obligations in anyway to meet the provisions of this act, since the Government is to pay out only after it has received and to pay no more than it does receive from the 2-percent transaction tax; and

Whereas the enactment of said plan into law will—

(1) Provide employment for millions of persons now idle by increasing production and withdrawing large numbers of elderly people from the field of productive activity, thus creating new opportunities for the youth of our land and making unemployment benefits unnecessary;

(2) Greatly reduce crime, thus saving billions of dollars expended annually for the enforcement of law, maintenance of numerous prisons, reformatories, and protective agencies; also saving tremendous direct losses to our private citizens due to crime;

(3) Save billions of dollars now spent for the maintenance of public-welfare agencies, poorhouses, old people's homes, and other institutions and temporary organizations maintained for the care of the poor and aged; and minimize the necessity for yearly public and private charities; thus inspiring a greater spirit of loyalty to our governments and their institutions;

(4) Substitute an economy of abundance for an economy of scarcity and provide markets for the products of our farms and industries;

(5) Effect tremendous savings which will offset the cost of operating and maintaining the proposed plan; and

(6) Stabilize business and industry and guard against future depressions; and establish a stable and permanent social and economic system: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Florida, do respectfully memorialize and petition the Congress of the United States (in order to accomplish the foregoing purposes) to immediately enact the General Welfare Act of 1937, known as bill H. R. 2 and now pending in Congress, a law providing for a national old-age retirement system and create a fund for the maintenance thereof through a 2 percent Federal Government transaction-tax levy, the proceeds of which shall be distributed equitably to all citizens over 60 years of age, with the provision that it shall be expended within 30 days; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be immediately transmitted to the President of the United States and the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and to each Senator and Representative in Congress from the State of Florida.

Approved by the Governor April 11, 1939.

Filed in office secretary of state April 12, 1939.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I desire to join in the presentation of the memorials of the Legislature of the State of Florida just presented by my colleague [Mr. PEPPER]. I have copies of them, and heartily join him in their presentation.

ALIENS AND IMMIGRATION—PETITIONS

Mr. VANDENBERG presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, relative to aliens and immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration; and one of the petitions was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the names attached, as follows:

PETITION TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES

If Americans are to continue to enjoy the freedom and liberties guaranteed by the Constitution, particularly those known as the Bill of Rights, we as Americans, must combat all alienisms that advocate the change and destruction of our constitution and form of government.

Therefore, we Americans whose signatures appear below, do hereby respectfully request the Congress of the United States to enact into law the Reynolds-Starnes bill, containing the following provisions:

1. Register and fingerprint all aliens.
2. Deport all aliens here illegally, those having a criminal record or engaged in subversive activities.
3. Stop all immigration for 10 years, or until such time as all Americans willing and able to work have jobs.

Further, we request that Congress pursue a course in our international policies that will keep us out of war.

The Constitution will safeguard our liberties only as long as we protect the Constitution—no longer. In defending it we protect ourselves.

PETITION OF MEMBERS OF NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, DAYTON, OHIO

Mr. VANDENBERG presented the petition of sundry war veterans of the National Military Home, Dayton, Ohio, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME,
Dayton, Ohio, April 19, 1939.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
The Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We, the undersigned war veterans, earnestly solicit your assistance in the matter of eliminating the misconduct bar which now prevents many deserving nonservice disabled veterans from receiving compensation or pension; that that obnoxious chain of misery be broken at this session of Congress.

Respectfully,

CARL H. DAVIS (and others).

UNIFIED RELIEF AND ESTABLISHMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS AGENCY

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I offer an amendment intended to be proposed ultimately to Senate bill 2202, to establish a Public Works Agency, which has been introduced by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. I should like to say that the amendment represents an effort to put together the proposals individually submitted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], and those heretofore submitted by myself in conjunction with the late Representative Bacon, of New York, for the purpose of unifying all relief under State decision and State responsibility supported by Federal grants-in-aid. While this draft may not be in its final form, and we reserve the right ultimately to change it, I think, for the information of the Senate and for the benefit of the debate which is shortly to ensue, it should be presented now. So, in behalf of the Senator from New Jersey, the Senator from Ohio, and myself, I offer the proposed amendment and ask that it be printed, printed in the RECORD, and lie upon the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table, and, without objection, printed in the RECORD.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

On page 9 at the end of line 9 add the following:

"SEC. 5. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States Government to discontinue on January 1, 1940, the administration of direct relief and work relief (which shall not be construed to include the activities of the Civilian Conservation Corps) and to assist thereafter in financing the administration of such relief by the States and the local subdivisions thereof. The Administrator shall cooperate with the States and local subdivisions and assist them to set up the necessary records, personnel, and organization to handle work relief, and on January 1, 1940, he shall discontinue the direct administration of relief.

"(a) The term 'needy individual' means any person who lacks self-support and who lacks resources from which may be derived support adequate to provide a reasonable standard of subsistence compatible with decency and health for such individual and for persons legally dependent upon such individual living in the same household, and includes such persons legally dependent upon such individual living in the same household.

"(b) The term 'State' shall include the District of Columbia and the Territories of Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

"SEC. 6. For the purpose of enabling each State to provide direct relief and work relief to needy individuals not otherwise receiving assistance or benefits as referred to titles I, II, III, IV, and X of the Social Security Act, or for whom the assistance or benefits received or referred to in such titles is inadequate to provide a reasonable subsistence compatible with decency and health, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the 6-month period beginning January 1, 1940, and ending June 30, 1940, the sum of $600,000,000, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year thereafter a sum sufficient to carry out the purposes of sections 5 to 10 of this act. The sums made available under this section shall be used for making payments only to States which have submitted, and had approved by the Administrator of Public Works, State plans for such services.

"SEC. 7. A State plan for direct relief and work relief within the meaning of this act must—

"(1) provide that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State;

"(2) provide for financial participation by the State, or by political subdivisions thereof, or by both, in the cost of such relief;

"(3) either provide for the administration of the plan by a single permanent State agency, or provide for the administration of the plan by agencies of political subdivisions within the State, supervised by such single permanent State agency, and shall provide that such State agency be directed and controlled by a relief board of not less than five persons, no more than a bare majority of whom shall be members of any one political party;

"(4) provide that all officials (except Board members) and employees of such State agency, and of all agencies of political subdivisions administering the plan, shall be selected and protected in their tenure of office by civil-service laws;

"(5) provide that the State agency and the agencies of political subdivisions within the State will make such reports in such form and containing such information as the Board may from time to time require;

"(6) provide that there shall be no unreasonable discrimination between needy individuals within the jurisdiction of the State;

"(7) provide for the periodic reexamination and reconsideration of all individuals receiving financial assistance under the plan;

"(8) provide that the State agency may enter into reciprocal agreements with the appropriate agencies in other States for the care, treatment, and redomiciling of transient needy individuals; and

"(9) provide the exact manner in which the share of the State, or the subdivisions, or both, shall be paid into the relief fund.

"(b) The Board shall approve any plan which fulfills the conditions specified in subsection (a), except that it shall not approve any plan which imposes, as a condition of eligibility for work relief under the plan—

"(1) any residence requirement which excludes any resident of the State who has resided therein continuously for 1 year immediately preceding the application: or

"(2) any citizenship requirement which excludes any citizen of the United States; and

"(3) any procedural requirement which involves certification by any agency or individual other than the State agency administering or supervising the administration of the plan or the local administrative units under the supervision of the State agency.

"SEC. 8. (A) From the sums appropriated therefor, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan under this title for each quarter beginning with the quarter commencing January 1, 1940, an amount, which shall be used exclusively as financial assistance, equal to two-thirds of the total of the sums expended during such quarter as financial assistance by the State and the political subdivisions therein under the State plan, in which expenditures shall be counted—

"(1) payments of direct relief, both in cash and in kind, with respect to needy individuals who at the time such payments were made were not inmates of any public institution; and

"(2) the ascertained cost of all work relief projects on which only needy individuals (other than supervisors) are employed, and 80 percent of all expenditures are direct payments to such needy individuals;

"Provided, however, That the total amount paid to any State for any quarter shall not exceed such State's quota as calculated under paragraph (B) (1) of this section.

"(B) The method of computing and paying such amounts shall be as follows:

"(1) The Administrator shall, prior to the beginning of each quarter, fix the total amount which he will distribute during such quarter to all the States out of the amount or amounts appropriated by Congress for the entire fiscal year; he shall then calculate the quota of each State for such quarter by apportioning the amount he has fixed for all the States, among the several States in the following manner:

"(a) One-third in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of all the States, as shown by the latest available Federal census;

"(b) One-third in the ratio which the number of unemployed individuals in each State bears to the total number of such individuals in all the States, as shown by the latest available Federal census of unemployment, including the unemployment census of 1937, or by the latest available statistics with respect to unemployment supplied by Federal or State agencies;

"(c) One-third in the ratio which the prevailing average of wage rates as determined by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor in each State bears to the prevailing average of wage rates for all of the States, as similarly determined.

"(2) The Administrator shall, prior to the beginning of each quarter, estimate the amount to be paid to the State for such quarter, under subsection A of this section, but not exceeding the quota fixed under paragraph (B) (1) of this section, such estimate to be based on (a) a report filed by the State containing its estimate of the total sum to be expended in such quarter in accordance with the provisions of such subsection and stating the amount appropriated or made available by the State and its political subdivisions for such expenditures in such quarter, and if such amount is less than one-third of the total sum of such estimated expenditures, the source or sources from which the difference is expected to be derived, (b) records showing the number of needy individuals in the State, and (c) such other investigation as the Administrator may find necessary.

"(3) The Administrator shall then certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount so estimated by him, reduced or increased, as the case may be, by any sum by which he finds that his estimate for any prior quarter was greater or less than the amount which should have been paid to the State under subsection (A) for such quarter, except to the extent that such sum has been applied to make the amount certified for any prior quarter greater or less than the amount estimated by the Administrator for such prior quarter.

"(4) The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon, through the Division of Disbursement of the Treasury Department and prior to audit or settlement by the General Accounting Office, pay to the State, at the time or times fixed by the Administrator, the amount so certified.

"SEC. 9. In the case of any State plan for financial assistance under this title which has been approved by the Administrator, if the Administrator, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the State agency administering or supervising the administration of such plan, finds—

"(1) that the plan has been so changed as to impose any residence, citizenship, or other requirement for work relief prohibited by section 7 of this act, or that in the administration of the plan any such prohibited requirement is imposed, with the knowledge of such State agency, in a substantial number of cases; or

"(2) that in the administration of the plan there is a failure to comply substantially with any provision required by section 7 of this act to be included in the plan; the Administrator shall notify such State agency that further payments will not be made to the State until the Administrator is satisfied that such prohibited requirement is no longer so imposed, and that there is no longer any such failure to comply. Until he is so satisfied he shall make no further certification to the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to such State.

"SEC. 10. Not more than 10 percent of any amount or amounts appropriated by Congress for relief to be administered under the provisions of sections 5 to 10 of this act may be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the certificate of the Administrator, to any State or local subdivision thereof for the purposes stated in such sections, without regard to the limitations of amount or percentage prescribed by sections 8 and 9 of this act: Provided, That such payments may only be made if application therefor is made by such State or local subdivision and the Administrator, after a complete hearing, finds that by reason of disaster, or extraordinary conditions of unemployment, or extraordinary conditions of inability to finance relief, such State or local subdivision is unable to provide adequate relief within its boundaries, and the President approves such finding."

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, with regard to Senate bill 2202, referred to by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], I desire to advise the Senate that I do not intend to ask it to consider the bill today, for the reason that I am informed that the President tomorrow or, if not tomorrow, certainly on the following day will submit to the Congress a reorganization plan under the provisions of the Reorganization Act, which plan, among other things, will consolidate the various agencies proposed to be consolidated under my bill, with the exception of one or possibly two agencies which I understand are not to be included in it. Until the President submits his order to the Congress within the next day or two and the matter has been definitely determined, I think it would be unwise to ask the Senate to devote its time to the consideration of the provisions of a bill affecting the same subject matter.

Regardless of the submission of such an order, however, it is my opinion that the proposed legislation included in the bill, other than the consolidation provisions, should be considered by the Senate. After the order of the President has been received by the Congress and we have had an opportunity to study it, the committee can determine what bill should be presented to supplement the reorganization plan of the President. I certainly shall advocate legislation providing that the Congress determine the formula for the distribution of funds, and that a restriction be placed upon the transfer to other executive departments of funds appropriated for work relief. The proposed legislation will also embody one or two other proposals.

AMENDMENTS TO AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH submitted amendments proposing to increase the appropriation relating to information on marketing farm products from $418,970 to $518,970; to increase the appropriation for collecting, compiling, etc., crop and livestock estimates from $642,799 to $792,799; to increase the appropriation for collecting, publishing, etc., market news service from $1,122,302 to $1,372,302; and to increase the appropriation under the Farm Credit Administration, salaries and expenses, from $3,600,000 to $3,700,000, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5269, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, 1940, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SAVANNAH RIVER AND CLARK HILL RESERVATION, GA., AND SUSQUEHANNA RIVER AT HAVRE DE GRACE, MD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present letters from the Secretary of War, with accompanying reports, which I ask may be published as Senate documents. The reports are in relation to river and harbor matters under the jurisdiction of the Commerce Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letters together with the reports will be printed as Senate documents, with illustrations.

(The matters presented by Mr. SHEPPARD are as follows:)

Report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army on a reexamination of Savannah River, Ga., S. C., and N. C., and Clark Hill Reservation, Ga. (S. Doc. No. 66); and Report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army on a reexamination of the Susquehanna River at Havre de Grace, Md. (S. Doc. No. 67).

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RECORDER OF DEEDS

[Mr. TRUMAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by Prof. Kelly Miller to the New York Sun of Thursday, March 16, 1939, relative to the effect the so-called Griffenhagen plan for the reorganization of the government of the District of Columbia would have on the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, which appears in the Appendix.]

AMERICA'S FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, American mothers and many other American citizens have been and are still being badly frightened, disturbed, upset, and agitated by unfounded, sensational war propaganda. The time demands that a Member of the Senate speak out in plain language and let the administration, every country in Europe, and all citizens in America know exactly where he stands upon international issues, since the responsibility for declaring war and concurring in treaties rests upon the Congress by constitutional pronouncement.

It is my well-considered opinion that the outlook for American peace has never been brighter. Unless America goes to war without just cause, which is unthinkable, she will not engage in war for many, many years. I say to American mothers with all the earnestness I possess that there will not be an American war. No nation on the face of God's good earth wants one foot of American soil, and not one of them has the remotest thought or intention of attacking us or doing us violence. Every other misunderstanding that may occur between America and a foreign state can and will be settled around the conference table.

George Washington, upon his retirement from public life, admonished his countrymen wisely with this sound advice:

> Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. * * * A passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. * * * Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury * * * when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. * * * Inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded; and * * * in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated.

In that profound admonition I believe with all my heart. America must stop hating and stop "sicking" other nations into war. She must stop deceiving them or permitting them to assume the existence of an alliance with us which will never be consummated.

I shall wholeheartedly support moderate and sensible national defense, with special emphasis upon keeping fully abreast of the science of war through research and otherwise.

I shall vote for a policy of strict and absolute neutrality and shall oppose showing any favoritism toward any nation or pointing the finger of accusation toward any people with whom we are at peace.

I shall vote against having any connection, directly or indirectly, through sympathy, friendship, or alliance, with other people's wars. All should be warned now that if they go to war we shall have no part in it.

I shall vote against and actively work against the adoption of a policy of sanctions, encirclements, quarantines, world policing, or taking "steps short of war." In my thinking there are no steps short of war. There must be either war or honest neutrality.

If we should be invited by states involved in an international dispute to act as an intermediary—and, mind you, I say "invited"—we should accept the invitation graciously, and feel honored, and then serve to the best of our ability with clean hands and without prejudice, and only upon the absolute understanding that we will not underwrite by force or otherwise any settlements reached through our good offices.

I shall not be pushed one step toward "steps short of war," but so long as I occupy my high office will fight with all my energy to keep my country out of Europe's chronic and sordid quarrels.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4630) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes.

VOLUNTARY RESETTLEMENT OF AMERICAN NEGROES IN AFRICA

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, with the patience and kind indulgence of my colleagues, I trust I may be permitted at this time to discuss for a little while what is, in my judgment, the greatest, most important, and far-reaching problem that has ever or will ever confront the American people for solution.

It is important in the highest degree because it involves the welfare and perpetuity of two races, the white race and the black race, which are now trying to live side by side in the same domain and under the same government.

The solution of this problem is equally as important to the black race as to the white race, because without a proper solution both races will be destroyed and will be succeeded by a mongrel race, and at the same time the white race will suffer the loss of all that is dear and precious, high and noble in our civilization.

As certainly as that the sun shines and there is a God in heaven, believe it or not, there are only two solutions to our ever-present race problem in the United States. One solution is the physical separation of the races, thereby preventing the commingling of the blood streams of both the black race and the white race. A physical separation by the voluntary colonization or resettlement of the black race in its fatherland, from which it was brought here by fraud and force, will thereby give the Negro race an opportunity to protect the integrity of its blood stream and have a free and full opportunity to reach the greatest heights of development of which the race is capable and build a nation of the Negro race that will take its stand among the nations of the earth; and by this separation the blood stream of the white race shall remain unchanged and all the culture, progress, and the blessings of the white man's civilization shall forever remain the priceless possession of the Anglo-Saxon in this proud Republic.

The other solution to this great problem is to let the two races continue to live side by side in the same country, which will result, as certain as fate, in the complete amalgamation of the two races in the years to come, and in the loss of the white man's civilization. For 300 years we have tried to live side by side, and in this period of time—a short span when compared with the lives of nations—there have come to be in our midst four or five million citizens of our country in whose veins commingle the blood of the white man and the black man, which should be enough to convince any man or woman with any symptom of intelligence that complete amalgamation will some day be a sad but accomplished fact.

The solution of this race question by the process of amalgamation will take place, whether we wish it or not, if we fail or refuse to solve the problem by physical separation. Therefore it is evident that all the citizens of this country—black or white—whether they desire to be so or not, are either separationists or amalgamationists.

I am constrained to believe that 99 percent of the white race are naturally and normally opposed to the amalgamation or interbreeding of the two races. I also believe that 75 percent of the black race have pride in their racial integrity and are at heart opposed to the mixing of their race with the white race.

I repeat, every citizen, black or white, is on one side or the other. There is no middle ground. This is one question which we cannot straddle. If one is opposed to and is not willing to assist in the physical separation of the races, which is the only thing that will prevent amalgamation, then he is an amalgamationist. Everyone classifies himself by his own stand.

If one is indifferent and is willing to let things go on as they are now going, his indifference and lack of positive action lines him up with the amalgamationists.

The most gratifying thing in my life is to be able today to present to the American Congress petitions signed by two and one-half million American Negroes pleading and begging for a physical separation of the races. By their act in signing these petitions to be resettled in their fatherland—Africa—they say to the world, "We are proud of our race; we believe in racial integrity; we are not willing to have our blood stream commingled with the white blood. We want to flee from this certain disaster that is going to overtake both races by complete amalgamation and the production of a mongrel race.

These petitioners know that in saving their race they are likewise saving ours. They have faith in their ability to work out their own destiny and establish a nation in a country all their own, where they can reach their highest destiny in a land of freedom—a land without oppression and a land without discrimination.

I call the attention of the Senate to the presence of these petitions. The signatures have been carefully counted, and the petitions have been signed by two and a half million Negroes of the United States. I may add that the petitions come from every State in the Union, praying and asking for a physical separation of the races, or that an opportunity be afforded the Negroes to be resettled in their fatherland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petitions presented by the Senator from Mississippi will be received and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, there is ample evidence that the Negro nationalists, who support this bill, have chosen between the alternative solutions of race problems—between separation and amalgamation—for they have given a wide circulation to the privately published race studies of Earnest Sevier Cox, of Richmond, Va. The works of this author deal with the nature of race problems, rather than with the various phases of the problem, and there has been a close and long friendship between this author and the Negro leaders of the nationalistic movement.

At this point I wish to read into the RECORD, for the information of the Senate and of the country, the titles of these splendid publications by Colonel Cox. They are White America, Let My People Go, The South's Part in Mongrelizing the Nation, and Lincoln's Negro Policy.

In this connection, since the press of the country has given notice of the introduction of a bill on this subject by me, I wish to read some telegrams which I received this morning. First, I read a telegram from Cleveland, Ohio, as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, April 24, 1939.

I am pleased that through your efforts the Senate will receive the resettlement program of the American Negro in his fatherland. We in Cleveland are 100 percent behind you. I feel that if the Negro will ever become a man he must be placed back in his fatherland.

STIENBART DYER.

I received the following telegram from Tampa, Fla.:

TAMPA, FLA., April 24, 1939.

We congratulate you in sponsoring the program for American Negroes returning to their fatherland.

DIVISION No. 272, U. N. I. A.,
JOHN WIGGS, Secretary.

The following telegram came from Jacksonville:

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., April 23, 1939.

Senator THEO G. BILBO,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Your law abiding citizens, followers of the martyred African Princess Laura Adorkor Koffey, assassinated Miami, Fla., March 8, 1928, in hearty accord with your views as published under your name in Chicago Defender of April 22, 1939. Prayerful wishes for your continued interest and courageous efforts in this cause so thoroughly misrepresented by an element of our visionless misleaders.

MISSIONARY AFRICAN UNIVERSAL CHURCH, INC.

This telegram came from New York:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 24, 1939.

Senator THEODORE BILBO,
Senate Chamber:

Ten thousand Negroes of the Universal Negro Improvement Association, assembled in mass meeting, endorse your proposed repatriation bill. Hoping for the full support of your fellow Senators.

I received a letter from New York this morning which is very interesting. It reads:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 23, 1939.

Mr. BILBO:

DEAR SIR: I, Mack Royal, of 2760–8, Apartment 16, sir, on Saturday, April 22, 1939, I was reading the newspaper and I saw where you were to interduce a bill on sinding the back people to Libira. I am very much interrested in the plan. I would be very glad if you are able to pass the bill for I am one seartnley will go at the word—I and my whole famley. I am a familey of five, and each one are willing to go at the word. Sir, please inrole my name; please do this with fail. I thank you sir in advance. I trust that you will bee able to pass the bill.

Sinsear yours,

M. C. ROYAL.

Sir, please let me know if you received this letter.

I now read a letter from Indianapolis, Ind., received this morning:

2702 CAROLINE AVENUE,
Indianapolis, Ind., April 21, 1939.

THEODORE G. BILBO,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am writing this little note of acknowledgment to your telegram which I received on last evening. I wish to thank you kindly for being so considerate and thoughtful of our club here in Indianapolis, Ind.

The club glories in your spunk in producing a bill of this type to the Senate for judgment. I am very sorry to report that at the present time I am unable to attend the session, but the entire club as well as myself will be with you both spiritually and mentally if not physically.

We are deeply interested in the outcome of this repatriation movement and resettlement program, so if you do not contact division No. 117 directly, you will have the assurance we are with you in mind and spirit.

May God bless you in your untiring efforts, and we do wish you much success in your endeavors, present and future. I beg to remain,

Yours very truly,

THOMAS JOHNSON, President.
PEARL BARNES, Secretary.

The following letter from New Jersey was received this morning:

BETHEL A. M. E. CHURCH,
Woodbury, N. J., April 21, 1939.

The Honorable Mr. THEODORE BILBO,
United States Senator from Mississippi,
The United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

YOUR HONOR SENATOR BILBO: Accept my congratulations for the far-sightedness you have manifested in the preparation of the back-to-Africa bill.

My church and I are behind you. Whatever support you may need to help in the passage of this bill, wire me.

Yours sincerely,

WM. A. DORSEY.

This letter came from Virginia:

CAMPASTELLA,
Norfolk, Va., April 22, 1939.

Hon. THEODORE G. BILBO,
United States Senator of Mississippi,
Washington, D. C.:

Your telegram was received, but we are indeed sorry that we can't have a representative present.

But we, the officers and members of the Berkley Division, No. 339, of the V. N. E. A., representing the divisions in tidewater and throughout the State of Virginia, sincerely urge the passage of your repatriation bill.

We believe your plan is one of the greatest ever advanced to bring the great race problem in America to a speedy close.

There are thousands of Negroes in America who want to return to their fatherland and will be too glad to go when the way is provided.

Thanking you in advance and trusting that you will find many supporters among your fellow Senators and Congressmen, we remain,

Yours for success,

BERKLEY DIVISION, No. 339, OF V. N. E. A., SAMUEL ASHBY, President.

Mr. President, on May 24 of last year I presented to the Seventy-fifth Congress an amendment to the relief bill then under consideration by the Senate, providing for the repatriation of citizens of the United States of African descent to the Republic of Liberia, and/or such contiguous territory as may be acquired by the United States by purchase from France and Great Britain, such negotiations to be consummated on the basis that the purchase price of the acquired territory should be represented by a credit on the war debts owing to the United States by these countries.

After submitting the amendment I discussed it before the Senate in considerable detail, setting forth, first, in a brief summary, the political and economic support given the repatriation movement by the foremost citizens of this country from the foundation of the Republic to the present time; and, second, extensive biological sanctions of the movement gained from an exhaustive study of the views of the most eminent authorities in the sciences of anthropology, ethnology, and of the world's most renowned writers on the principles of inheritance. At the conclusion of this discussion I withdrew my amendment, having availed myself of the opportunity of submitting what I believed to be irrefutable reasons for its support, because, at the last moment, I considered it the better part of wisdom to present the proposition as an independent measure in the next succeeding Congress. In conformity to a pledge to that effect made to the Senate, and to the 2,000,000 or more citizens of the United States of African descent interested in migrating to Liberia, I now offer a bill to provide for the liquidation and settlement of the war debts due the United States; to create a bureau of colonization and to provide for the migration and colonization of United States citizens to newly acquired territory; to provide aid to United States citizens desirous to migrate to the Republic of Liberia, and for other purposes. The bill declares the intent of Congress to be that the benefits and provisions thereof shall apply to citizens of the United States who may qualify as eligible for citizenship in the Republic of Liberia, and who, by their physical fitness and climatic adaptability, may qualify as migrants to be permanently settled in the territory to be acquired, and who shall have voluntarily expressed a desire to become migrants under the provisions of the bill.

I most respectfully ask unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill be printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following the remarks I am about to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, as requested, will be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi.

The bill (S. 2231) to provide for the liquidation and settlement of the war debts due to the United States; to create a Bureau of Colonization and provide for the migration and colonization of the United States citizens to newly acquired territories; to provide aid to United States citizens desirous to migrate to the Republic of Liberia, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, let me say in this connection that the impression seems to prevail in the minds of some people, especially some of our colored friends, and especially among the newspaper element of our colored friends, that the proposal to provide for the resettlement of the American Negro in his fatherland is all a plan of my own. An attempt would naturally be made on the part of some of these amalgamationists, miscegenationists to prejudice the proposal because I am a Senator representing the South. I wish to say that I am pursuing and prosecuting the campaign for this great program which means the salvation of both the white and the black races, with the support of millions of Negroes, in every State in the American Union, as evidenced by the petition which is on my desk, representing two and one-half million American Negroes.

As I have stated frequently, the Negro in America has no better friend than I am to him. The mere fact that I spent 4 days on the floor of the Senate fighting the so-called antilynching bill is evidence of the fact that I understand the proposition; that I am a real friend to the Negro because, knowing my section as I do, having served as Governor of my State for 8 years, I knew that that legislation would double the number of lynchings in the South. We in the South are solving the lynching question. Lynchings were reduced to about five last year, and it is the sentiment of all right-thinking people that they shall be stopped, but they cannot be stopped by the passage of a piece of unconstitutional and un-American legislation.

The truth about the campaign to bring about the passage of an antilynching bill is that there is a certain organization in this country which has been merely profiteering and racketeering on its own race and others by using the proposal to pass an antilynching bill as a means to arouse prejudice and create interest. In fact, that organization is not the friend of the Negro race. What I am now doing is trying to serve the Negro race in a proper way.

Mr. President, the first effort made to bring about the colonization of the American Negroes was by a committee in the General Assembly of Virginia in the year 1777. Thomas Jefferson was chairman of that committee. It reported favorably on a resolution for the emancipation and colonization of Virginia slaves. It contemplated the acquisition of territory—a gradual enforcement of the plan, and not only to establish them in a territory of their own, but to support them until they had acquired strength enough to sustain themselves. Only young men, having attained the age of 21, and young women, having reached the age of 18, were eligible.

That was under Jefferson's plan back in 1777. If Senators will read the bill which I have introduced, I believe they will come to the conclusion that no more gracious, more liberal, and finer spirit of helpfulness can be found in all history than the provisions this bill holds up to members of the Negro race who desire to go back to their fatherland and have a chance in a country of their own.

Mr. President, I wish to hear anyone make any observations or objections to my bill because of the suggested expenditure contained in it. The bill provides for the appropriation of a billion dollars to begin with to resettle these people in their native land. That is a very small consideration when we think what the Negro race has contributed to this Nation from the time the Negroes were in slavery even up to the present time, and it is a small consideration when we consider what the Congress is year after year appropriating to carry several million of our American citizens on the relief rolls.

I may say that almost 75 percent of those on the relief rolls in many States are Negroes. Take the District of Columbia, with 10,000 persons on the relief rolls. The record shows that approximately 8,000 of those persons are Negroes and 2,000 whites, notwithstanding the fact that the population of the District of Columbia is 400,000 whites and 200,000 blacks. In other words, 8,000 of the 200,000 blacks are on the relief rolls and only 2,000 of the 400,000 whites. Already it has been suggested that an appropriation of one billion and a half dollars be made for relief for next year. At the last session we appropriated over $2,000,000,000 for relief. One-half of that amount of money could be spent in providing for the resettlement of the Negro in his native fatherland, and the Government would save money on the transaction, because if we could succeed in removing 5,000,000, 6,000,000, or 8,000,000 Negroes who are now ready to go to Africa we would solve the unemployment problem and do away with the necessity for relief, for there would be a job for every white man and woman in America.

We have two classes of lawmakers. That is true in every legislative body. One class thinks only of today; the other class thinks of tomorrow as well as today. One type prefers to travel in the old ruts; the other prefers to blaze a new road. One type wants to hug the ground with the horse and buggy; the other prefers the air and the heavens above. One class thinks only of something that is ephemeral, that is, temporary, but which will help reelect it to office; the other thinks of the welfare of the country in the future as well as the present, regardless of the results of elections.

Immediately following the War for Independence several States of the Union liberated their slaves, and, as a consequence, outstanding white men began to seek and discuss ways and means to repatriate these freedmen.

It is to us of special significance that Thomas Jefferson was the first man of great prominence to be identified with a repatriation movement in this country. This man Jefferson, the father of the party to the principles of which a majority of the Senate subscribes, wrote more learnedly and truthfully about the Negro than any other man of his time. On divers occasions he implored his countrymen, with the vision of an inspired prophet, to seek to evade, by emancipation and repatriation, a national disgrace and ruin that it now appears will soon overtake us. Notwithstanding his frequent utterances warning the Nation against the evils that would follow where two dissimilar races, equally free, were compelled to live together, many Sophists of his day appealed to the author of the Declaration of Independence in support of the position that the Negro should be recognized in this country upon terms of perfect equality with the white man. The New York Tribune, the most outstanding newspaper of that age, on April 14, 1866, said:

Mr. Jefferson is, and ought to be, held in sincere reverence by all radicals because of his agency in basing the Declaration of Independence on the broad, comprehensive, eternal principle of equal human rights. As to the fundamental base of our political system, Mr. Jefferson is, and ought to be, the highest authority.

As a matter of fact, when Mr. Jefferson penned the Declaration of Independence he never once thought of the Negro. When he spoke of men, he thought of white men of European origin. When he talked of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, he was oblivious of any consideration of the Negro. If we fairly scrutinize and weigh intelligently what Mr. Jefferson really did say and write on the subject of the Negro during more than half a century subsequent to the day he penned the Declaration of Independence we will unmistakably find irrefutable proof of our contention that he had no thought of the Negro when he said "All men are created free and equal."

I consider it opportune at this time to quote extensively from the writings of Mr. Jefferson on the subject of segregating the Negro race, more especially the things written from July 4, 1776, the date of that ever memorable document, the Declaration of Independence, to the date of his death, on July 4, 1826.

In Jefferson's Works, volume 8, page 380, written in 1782, we find these words with respect to the general characteristics of the Negro:

Deep-rooted prejudices entertained by the whites, 10,000 recollections by the blacks of the injuries they have sustained, new provocations, the real distinctions which nature has made, and many other circumstances will divide us into parties and produce convulsions which will probably never end but in the extermination of the one or the other race.

In Jefferson's Works, volume 5, page 563, is found a letter written by Mr. Jefferson to John Lynch, under date of January 21, 1811, with respect to an inquiry from Mr. Lynch on the proposition of a Mrs. Mifflin to colonize people of color on the coast of Africa. It reads as follows:

You have asked my opinion on the proposition of Mrs. Mifflin, to take measures for procuring, on the coast of Africa, an establishment to which the people of color of these States might, from time to time, be colonized, under the auspices of different governments. Having long ago made my mind up on this subject, I have no hesitation in saying that I always thought it the most desirable measure which could be adopted for gradually drawing off this part of our population most advantageously for themselves as well as for us. Going from a country possessing all the useful arts, they might be the means of transplanting them among the inhabitants of Africa, and would thus carry back to the country of their origin the seeds of civilization, which might render their sojournment and sufferings here a blessing in the end to that country.

Again, in a letter addressed to Dr. Thomas Humphreys by Mr. Jefferson, under date of February 8, 1817, found in Jefferson's Works, volume 7, page 57, we find these words:

I concur entirely in your leading principles of gradual emancipation, of establishment on the coast of Africa, and the patronage of our Nation until the emigrants shall be able to protect themselves. The subordinate details might be easily arranged. * * * Personally I am ready and desirous to make any sacrifice which shall ensure their gradual but complete retirement from the State, and effectually, at the same time, establish them elsewhere in freedom and safety. But I have not perceived the growth of this disposition in the rising generation, of which I once had sanguine hopes. No symptoms inform me that it will take place in my day. I leave it, therefore, to time, and not at all without hope that the day will come, equally desirable and welcome to us as to them.

It seems that back in 1817 Thomas Jefferson appreciated the fact that it would be a Herculean task to bring about the desired result, because he said he did not hope to see it in his lifetime. However, I am convinced that the day will soon come when this great program can be made effective. It will be made effective because the Negro himself, as he suffers discrimination, as he suffers from the pressure of economic conditions, as he suffers more and more year after year from attempting to live with the white man, will demand a physical separation; and whenever the great majority of the Negroes demand it we shall have no trouble in obtaining enough votes in the Congress to pass the legislation.

On page 48, volume 1 of Jefferson's Works, an autobiography written in 1821, Mr. Jefferson said with respect to the Negro:

Nothing is more certainly written in the Book of Fate than that these people are to be free; nor is it less certain that the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same government. Nature, habit, opinion, have drawn indelible lines of distinction between them. It is still in our power to direct the process of emancipation and deportation peaceably and in such slow degree as that the evil will wear off insensibly, and their place be, pari passu, filled up by free white laborers.

The scheme underlying the repatriation bill is that the transfer of the American Negro to his fatherland shall be a gradual process, so as not to disturb economic conditions in this country, and so that it can be done peaceably. There is not one line or word of compulsion in the scheme. It is all voluntary. We are not trying to Hitlerize our Negro friends in this country. We are trying to help them.

Mr. Jefferson again advocates African colonization of the Negro race in a letter to Jared Sparks under date of February 4, 1824, the letter being found in Jefferson's Works, volume 7, page 332. It reads as follows:

The article on the African colonization of the people of color, to which you invite my attention, I have read with great consideration. It is, indeed, a fine one and will do much good. I learn from it more, too, than I had before known of the degree of success and promise of that colony. In the disposition of this unfortunate people, there are two rational objects to be distinctly kept in view. First, the establishment of a colony on the coast of Africa, which may introduce among the aborigines the arts of cultivated life and the blessings of civilization and science. By doing this we may make to them some retribution for the long course of injuries we have been committing on their population. * * * The second object, and the most interesting to us, as coming home to our physical and moral characters, to our happiness and safety, is to provide an asylum to which we can, by degrees, send the whole of that population from among us and establish them, under our patronage and protection, as a separate, free, and independent people in some country and climate friendly to human life and happiness. * * * I do not go into all the details of the burdens and benefits of this operation. And who could estimate its blessed effects? I leave this to those who will live to see their accomplishment, and to enjoy a beatitude forbidden to my age. But I leave it with this admonition—to rise and be doing.

It will be found from these few excerpts taken from Mr. Jefferson's writings that he weighed every possible alternative, and finally decided upon separation as the only solution of the race problem. He declared that while he desired the Negro to enjoy the full liberties of men, yet it must be in a country of their own, and in a climate suited to their phyiscal fitness and congenial to their mode of living. Is it not strange that the people of this Nation, who have for so long a time honored and revered the name and fame of the incomparable Jefferson, who have seen the renown of his great intellect and commanding abilities increase with the growth of time, still refuse to give heed to his warnings and admonitions with respect to a calamity which he so often pointed out would overtake us? Why do we accept without protest a part of his teachings, and reject another part equally essential to the preservation of the Union? Could he be right only in his advocacy of the principles of government which he enunciated more than a century and a half ago, and to which we enthusiastically and unreservedly subscribe as members of the party he founded, and on the other hand be absolutely wrong with respect to the one particular evil that would eventually destroy the Republic to the establishment of which he had contributed more generously and wisely than any other man.

Thomas Jefferson, the original Democrat; Thomas Jefferson, philosopher and politician; Thomas Jefferson, who has been described as artist, naturalist, scientist, sentimentalist, and utilitarian; as thinker, dreamer, and doer; as inventor and scholar; writer and statesman; who enthralled his followers, and fascinated, while infuriated, his foes, said:

The two races equally free cannot live in the same government.

Who is so bold as to dare deny the truth of these words of Jefferson, which have rolled down through the years in thunderous tones, only to fall unheeded upon ears that would not hear? Jefferson understood, as did no other man of his time or since his day, that the race problem admits of but one of two solutions; namely, separation or amalgamation. By "separation" he did not mean mere segregation. True, segregation would reduce race friction, but it would not solve the problem. It would merely prolong the process of amalgamation. It would move forward a few centuries the date when the future American would become a Negroid.

Scientific research has successfully established three propositions beyond all controversy:

First, the white race has founded, developed, and maintained every civilization known to the human race.

Second, the white race, having founded, developed and maintained a civilization, has never been known, in all history, to lose that civilization so long as the race was kept white.

Third, the white man has never kept unimpaired the civilization he has founded and developed after its blood stream has been adulterated by the blood stream of another race, more especially another race so widely diverse in all its inherent qualities as the black race.

No man in America since the foundation of the Republic has understood and appreciated better than did Thomas Jefferson the truth of these three propositions.

The next man in our Nation to propose colonization as a permanent settlement of the Negro problem was William Thornton, a philanthropist, who lived in Washington. He advocated the repatriation of all people of color from the United States back to the homes of their fathers in the African Continent. Nothing he did, however, took shape toward a definite movement. It was not until the formation in Washington of the American Colonization Society that the destinies of the colored people in the United States began to crystallize into a definite idea. Before the organization of the American Colonization Society one other man, an American Negro by the name of Paul Cuffe, became interested in Negro repatriation in 1811, and succeeded in obtaining the consent of Sierra Leone, a small country on the West Coast of Africa, to a program for receiving free American Negroes. Paul Cuffe was a native of Massachusetts, and at the age of 16 was a sailor on a whaling vessel. He organized a crew of Negro seamen and sailed to Sierra Leone and made arrangements with that Government for the reception of Negro emigrants. His plan, however, was not begun until 1815, when, at his own expense, he carried a shipload of free Negroes from Massachusetts to Sierra Leone. He died in 1817, the very year in which citizens of the United States organized the American Colonization Society in the city of Washington. The purpose of this organization was to carry out a program of Negro repatriation. This society, soon after its organization, appreciated the fact that land would have to be acquired upon which to settle the Negro emigrants and that ways and means for their settlement and temporary maintenance would have to be devised. The organization realized further that the task was far beyond their powers to cope with unless it should be aided by the Federal Government. It was their purpose to begin the work of repatriation and thereafter enlist the cooperation of the Federal Government in their praiseworthy undertaking. No organization in the history of our country has had enlisted in its support a more distinguished group of American citizens than the American Colonization Society. Bushrod Washington was the first president. Among the nationally known men who were members of this society, that had for its purpose the repatriation of the Negro, were such distinguished men as Francis Scott Key, John Randolph, Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, Charles Fenton Mercer, John Marshall, Andrew Jackson, Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, Abraham Lincoln, and a long line of other prominent Americans.

It might be of interest to those who live in Washington to know that the American Colonization Society is still in existence, and is headed now by Colonel West, who lives in this city.

Daniel Webster, a name just mentioned as one of the members of the society, said on one occasion, as reported in Webster's Works, volume 5, page 364:

> If any gentleman from the South shall propose a scheme to be carried on by this Government upon a large scale for the transportation of the colored people to any colony or any place in the world, I should be quite disposed to incur almost any degree of expense to accomplish that object.

Those were the sentiments of Daniel Webster during the early days.

Henry Clay, another member of the society, said in his speech in the House of Representatives in 1827:

> Of the utility of a total separation of the two incongruous portions of our population, none have ever doubted. The mode of accomplishing that desirable object has alone divided public opinion. Colonizations in Haiti, for a time, had its partisans. Without throwing any impediments in the way of executing that scheme the American Colonization Society has steadily adhered to its own. * * * Colonization beyond the Stony Mountains—> has sometimes been proposed, but it would be attended with an expense and difficulties far surpassing the African project, whilst it would not unite the same animating motives.

Charles Fenton Mercer, also named as a member of the society, sponsored a Virginia memorial requesting the President to acquire land for a Negro colony. Mercer finally became a Member of Congress, and his first move toward the repatriation of the American Negro was to strike at the slave traffic. The antislave act of March 3, 1819, was initiated and engineered through Congress by Mercer. Out of this act developed an appropriation of funds to be used to return to Africa the slaves that were brought illegally to this country. When the time came to execute the provisions of this act Mercer went to President Monroe and insisted that if the unfortunate captives should be returned to the coast of Africa under the provisions of the act, which he had been successful in passing, and if they were there released, the probability was that they would be sold as slaves again and eventually brought back to the United States. President Monroe was favorably impressed with his reason, and thereupon determined to acquire lands on the west coast of Africa on which illegally imported slaves to the United States could be settled and cared for by the Federal Government. In cooperation with the American Colonization Society, he sent out agents to acquire this territory. Sam J. Mills and E. Burgess were directed by the Colonization Society to proceed to the West Coast of Africa and report upon the British settlements in that vicinity with respect to their suitability for a proposed colony of American freedmen and illegally imported slaves. The report of these men justified the society in proceeding further with its colonization movement, and 2 years later the first colony of 88 Negroes sailed for the African coast in the charge of three white Americans, named Bacon, Bankson, and Crozer, the last named being the society's agent, and the Reverend Sam Bacon being the agent of the United States Government. This was the first step taken in acquiring the land now called Liberia. The capital of this country is Monrovia, named for President Monroe.

Mercer did not stop with the Anti-Slave Trade Act of 1819. In 1820 he secured the passage of a measure through Congress, which declared that citizens of the United States engaged in the slave trade should be adjudged pirates and, upon conviction, should suffer death. In 1830 Congress published a volume of 293 pages dealing with Mercer's official efforts in the interest of Negro repatriation and the suppression of the slave trade. It has been said to the credit of Mercer:

> There is no portion of the African Continent now under political control of Negro people save that portion reserved for them principally through the labor of Mercer.

During the time of Mercer's efforts to bring about repatriation of free Negroes, there were upwards of 200,000 free colored people scattered through the Union. They enjoyed, in those days, just as the situation is here today, few of the advantages of freedom. It was thought by the American Colonization Society that if a colony for the 200,000 freed Negroes of the United States could be established in the land of their race, they might, in time, with the proper care and attention given by the Federal Government, become a self-supporting community and thus prepare a way and a home for the eventual colonization of the remaining millions of slaves who, at some future time, would most certainly be given their freedom.

Following the first shipment of 88 Negroes to the African coast, the very next year the ship Nautilus, chartered by the United States Government, voyaged to Africa with two Government agents on board, named Winn and Bacon, who were accompanied by two officials of the Colonization Society and a further group of Negro emigrants.

In the autumn of 1821 Dr. Eli Ayres was appointed chief agent of the Colonization Society. He went to Cape Montserrado, the site of the present city of Monrovia, and succeeded in acquiring the whole of the Montserrado promontory, and, as a result, all emigrants were transferred to this new acquisition and there made good their final occupancy.

On Ayres' return to Washington the American Colonization Society selected Jehudi Ashmum, a Negro, for service with the Negro emigrants in Africa. It is said that the life of this man was one continuous sacrifice of self on the altar of duty. He proceeded to Africa in the brig Strong, in charge of another group of emigrants. He was instructed to take full control of the settlement. His departure from the United States was on June 20, 1822, and early in August he reached his destination, and assumed the direction and administration of the colony. No man ever gave a greater measure of devotion to any cause than Ashmum did to the progress and development of the colony of freedmen settled in Liberia. As a representative of the Colonization Society and an administrator and a leader of men, the name of Jehudi Ashmum will never be forgotten wherever and whenever the story of Liberia is told.

When Ashmum sailed for the United States he handed over the reins of the administration to Rev. Lott Cary, who remained at the head of affairs at Montserrado until the arrival of Dr. R. Randall, who was appointed by the society in Ashmum's place. By this time the number of the American emigrants had reached nearly 3,000, and the designation of the chief administrative authority was changed to that of governor. The first Governor of Liberia was a white American named Thomas Buchanan. At the close of his administration he was succeeded by Joseph J. Roberts, a Virginia mulatto, who was confirmed by the Colonization Society. During Roberts' administration Liberia continued to grow in importance and in size. Roberts, realizing the necessity for funds to carry on his administrative duties, imposed upon goods imported into Liberia a 6-percent ad valorem duty. The imposition of this tax brought about the independence of Liberia. Foreigners refused to pay this duty upon the ground that the colony, as the commercial experiment of a philanthropic society, was incompetent to exercise sovereign rights implied by the levy of duties on imports. Many disagreeable incidents occurred, such as the seizure and subsequent release of certain infringing vessels, followed by a presentation to the Liberian authorities of heavy claims for damages alleged to have been suffered. The Government of the United States, when asked for a declaration of its attitude, made it clear that nothing was further from its intention than to assume the responsibilities of a protectorate of the colony. Thus, it appeared clear that only one thing remained to be done and that was for the settlers to take into their own hands the management of their affairs and to ask for recognition by the powers as an independent Negro state upon the west coast of Africa.

At this juncture, the American Colonization Society, finding that the offspring of its care and benevolence was now able to go it alone unaided, severed the bonds which had held the colony to the society for so many years. Therefore, the Liberian authorities, with unfaltering courage and with faith in what the future might have in store for them, resolved to act without further delay, and a convention was called to sit on the 25th day of June 1847. On the 26th day of the following month the declaration of independence was adopted. This declaration of independence is a document so remarkable for its dignity, its pathos, and its admirable clearness of phrase, that I feel that I cannot do better than read it in full at this point.

This declaration by the Republic of Liberia is in a class by itself, and it does great credit to the Negro race throughout the world.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE IN CONVENTION

TOWN OF MONROVIA,
June and July 1847.

PREAMBLE

We, the representatives of the people of the Commonwealth of Liberia, in convention assembled, invested with authority for forming a new government, relying upon the aid and protection of the Great Arbiter of human events, do hereby in the name and on behalf of the people of this commonwealth, publish and declare the said commonwealth a free, sovereign, and independent state, by the name and style of the Republic of Liberia.

CAUSES LEADING TO COLONIZATION AND INDEPENDENCE

While announcing to the nations of the world the new position which the people of this republic have felt themselves called upon to assume, courtesy to their opinion seems to demand a brief accompanying statement of the causes which induced them, first to expatriate themselves from the land of their nativity and to form settlements on this barbarous coast, and now to organize their Government by the assumption of a sovereign and independent character. Therefore, we respectfully ask their attention to the following facts:

NATURAL RIGHTS AND GOVERNMENT TO PROTECT THEM

We recognize in all men certain natural and inalienable rights—

These are Negroes talking—

among these are life, liberty, and the right to acquire, possess, enjoy, and defend property. By the practice and consent of men in all ages, some system or form of government is proven to be necessary to exercise, enjoy, and secure these rights; and every people has a right to institute a government and to choose and adopt that system or form of it which, in their opinion, will more effectively accomplish these objects and secure their happiness, which does not interfere with the just rights of others. The right, therefore, to institute government and all the powers necessary to conduct it is an inalienable right and cannot be resisted without the grossest injustice.

DENIAL OF NATURAL RIGHTS IN THE UNITED STATES

We, the people of the Republic of Liberia, were originally the inhabitants of the United States of North America. In some parts of that country we were debarred by law from all the rights and privileges of men; in other parts, public sentiment, more powerful than law, frowned us down. We were compelled to contribute to the resources of a country which gave us no protection. We were excluded from all participation in the Government. We were taxed without our consent. We were made a separate and distinct class, and against us every avenue to improvement was effectually closed. Strangers from all lands of a color different from ours were preferred before us. We uttered our complaints, but they were unattended to or met only by alleging the peculiar institution of the country. All hope of a favorable change in our country was thus wholly extinguished in our bosom, and we looked with anxiety abroad for some asylum from the deep degradation.

Today every right-thinking Negro in America knows that in this land he is being discriminated against, and will be as long as he lives in this country. That is why so many millions of them are begging to go to Liberia.

WEST AFRICA AS A PLACE OF REFUGE

The western coast of Africa was the place selected by American benevolence and philanthropy for our future home. Removed beyond those influences which depressed us in our native land, it was hoped we would be enabled to enjoy these rights and privileges and exercise and improve those faculties which the God of Nature has given us in common with the rest of mankind. Under the auspices of the American Colonization Society we established ourselves here on land acquired by purchase from the lords of the soil.

SUPERVISION OF THE COLONIZATION SOCIETY NO LONGER NECESSARY

In an original compact with this society, we, for important reasons, delegated to it certain political powers, while this institution stipulated that whenever the people should become capable of conducting the government, or whenever the people should desire it, this institution would resign the delegated power, peaceably withdraw its supervision, and leave the people to the government of themselves. Under the auspices and guidance of this institution, which has nobly and in perfect faith redeemed its pledges to the people, we have grown and prospered.

In the bill I am introducing today we provide first for a military government of 1 year, to be followed by a territorial government for 4 years, and after that by a commonwealth. All the time these American Negroes will be under the protection of and aided and assisted by the American Government until they reach the state of organization of a government yonder, in the territory we propose to buy, when they will be able to launch their own government as a free and independent nation in the world.

INCREASE OF POPULATION, TERRITORY, AND COMMERCE

From time to time our number has been increased by immigration from America and by accessions from native tribes, and from time to time, as circumstances required it, we have extended our borders by acquisition of land by honorable purchase from the natives of the country. As our territory has extended and our population increased, our commerce has also increased. The flags of most of the civilized nations of the earth float in our harbors and their merchants are opening an honorable and profitable trade. Until recently these visits have been of a uniformly harmonious character, but as they have become more frequent, and to more numerous points of our extending coast, questions have arisen which it is supposed can be adjusted only by agreement between sovereign powers.

ASSUMPTION OF GOVERNMENT BY PEOPLE

For years past the American Colonization Society has virtually withdrawn from all direct and active part in the administration of the Government, except in the appointment of the Governor, who is also a colonist, for the apparent purpose of testing the ability of the people to conduct the affairs of government; and no complaint of crude legislation, nor of mismanagement, nor of maladministration has yet been heard. In view of these facts, this institution the American Colonization Society, with that good faith which has uniformly marked all its dealings with us, did, by a set of resolutions in January A. D. 1846, dissolve all political connection with the people of this Republic, return the power with which it was delegated and left the people to the government of themselves. The people of the Republic of Liberia, then, are of right and, in fact, a free sovereign and independent State, possessed of all the rights and powers and functions of government.

RELIANCE ON CONSIDERATION OF THE CIVILIZED WORLD

In assuming the momentous responsibilities of the position they have taken, the people of this Republic feel justified by the necessities of the case, and with this conviction they throw themselves with confidence upon the candid consideration of the civilized world.

NO GREED OF TERRITORY

Liberia is not the offspring of grasping ambition, nor the tool of avaricious speculation. No desire for territorial aggrandizement brought us to these shores, nor do we believe so sordid a motive entered into the high consideration of those who aided us in providing this asylum. Liberia is an asylum from the most grinding oppression.

HOPES ENTERTAINED ON COMING HERE

In coming to the shores of Africa, we indulged the pleasing hope that we should be permitted to exercise and improve those faculties, which impart to man his dignity; to nourish in our hearts the flame of honorable ambition; to cherish and indulge those aspirations, which a beneficent Creator hath implanted in every human heart, and to evince to all who despise, ridicule, and oppress our race, that we possess with them a common nature, are with them susceptible of equal refinement, and capable of equal advancement in all that adorns and dignifies man. We were animated with the hope, that here we should be at liberty to train up our children in the way they should go, to inspire them with the love of an honorable fame, to kindle within them the flame of a lofty philanthropy, and to form strong within them the principles of humanity, virtue, and religion. Among the strongest motives to leave our native land, to abandon forever the scene of our childhood, and to sever the most endeared connections, was the desire for a retreat where, free from the agitations of fear and molestation, we could in composure and security approach in worship the God of our fathers.

REALIZATION OF HOPES

Thus far our highest hopes have been realized. Liberia is already the happy home of thousands, who were once the doomed victims of oppression; and if left unmolested to go on with her natural and spontaneous growth; if her movements be left free from the paralyzing intrigues of jealous ambition and unscrupulous avarice, she will throw open a wider and a wider door for thousands, who are now looking with an anxious eye for some land of rest.

I desire to say in this connection that the gate of Liberia is open today for thousands, and I might say millions, of American Negroes. I hold in my hand the original letter from the President of the Republic of Liberia, addressed to President Gordon, of the Peace Movement of Ethiopia, in which President Barclay announces to the world that millions of acres of land in Liberia are now ready and waiting to be settled by American Negroes. He sets out certain terms upon which the Republic will be willing to accept these immigrants. I desire to say that the terms provided for in our bill introduced on this day are more generous and more liberal, and we propose to do more than has been even suggested by President Barclay of the Republic for the immigrants who see fit to go into Liberia.

COURTS, SCHOOLS, AND CHURCHES OPEN TO ALL

Our courts of justice are open equally to the stranger and the citizen for the redress of grievances, for the remedy of injuries, and for the punishment of crime. Our numerous and well-attended schools attest our efforts and our desire for the improvement of our children. Our churches for the worship of our Creator, everywhere to be seen, bear testimony to our piety and to our acknowledgment of His providence. The native African bowing down with us before the altar of the living God, declare that from us, feeble as we are, the light of Christianity has gone forth, while upon that course of curses, the slave trade, a deadly blight has fallen as far as our influence extends.

APPEAL TO NATIONS

Therefore, in the name of humanity, and virtue, and religion; in the name of the Great God, our common Creator and our common Judge, we appeal to the nations of Christendom, and earnestly and respectfully ask them that they will regard us with the sympathy and friendly consideration to which the peculiarities of our condition entitle us and to extend to us that comity which marks the friendly intercourse of civilized and independent communities.

Done in convention at Monrovia, in the county of Montserrado, by the unanimous consent of the people of the commonwealth of Liberia this 26th day of July in the year of our Lord 1847.

In witness whereof we have hereto set our names.

So ends the reading of the declaration of independence adopted by the representatives of the people of the commonwealth of Liberia in convention assembled. The sentiments expressed in this remarkable document may become, with every propriety, the sentiments and expressions of hope and aspiration of more than 2,000,000 American citizens of African descent who have petitioned this Government to aid them in a voluntary migratory movement to Liberia. Its preamble, its statement of the causes leading to their colonization and independence; its lamentation because of the natural rights denied them in the United States; its profound conviction that the west coast of Africa was the place of proper refuge for the disconsolate members of the black race, are in every way applicable to the situation which obtains today with respect to the race's longing and yearning for a freedom denied them under a government conceived and administered by the white man. This declaration of independence should be read and pondered in the home of every citizen of the United States through whose veins flows a single drop of African blood.

Negroes of this country know what it means to have jobs denied them. They know the causes which bring about discriminations in favor of the white man. They understand why they are not permitted to play in the parks; to sit in the theaters, restaurants, hotels, and to ride on the trains and busses and airplanes with the white man. They have read numerous signs saying, "Negro, don't let the sun set on you in this town." They understand that there is a real difference between the opportunities offered them and those bestowed upon the white man.

The Negro appreciates the impossibility of his fulfilling, in this country, the high purposes which education and enlightenment have inspired him to hope for and to long for. No matter which way he turns, he sees evidence of a disparity of opportunity for him and his children. His schools are the poorest in the country; his housing accommodations are neglected. In Alabama he notes that less than one-eighth of the school funds are allotted to the education of his children, while one-third of the eligible school children are colored. In Georgia he observes that one-third of the children are blood of his blood, while only one-eighth of the school funds are allocated to their education. He has seen South Carolina, with one-half of the school children colored, spend $642,086 on school busses for white children for 1 year's transportation, and the sum of only $628 for colored children.

When it comes to jobs, the Negro is in no better condition today than he was immediately after receiving his freedom. The building-trades unions in both the North and the South used divers methods to exclude the Negro. The railroad brotherhoods deny them membership. The Supreme Court may rule that Negro defendants shall not be denied the right of trial by their peers, thus making it obligatory that the names of Negroes should appear upon the jury panel when their life or liberty is in jeopardy, but the Negro still continues to be barred from jury duty or to participate in any matter concerned with public justice. Just to make a feint toward compliance with this ruling of the Court, Negroes are sometimes called for jury service, but they are made to understand by the authorities that they must ask to be excused and accept the fee incidental to the summons. In the city of Washington—often called the Negroes' paradise—Marian Anderson, a Negro woman who has developed some reputation as a singer, was recently denied a request to sing in a Washington public-school auditorium and Constitution Hall, the latter a building owned, I am told, by the Daughters of the American Revolution.

These are only a few of the many thousands of discriminations against members of the Negro race as practiced consistently in this country. These discriminations are not any greater and are no less today than they were the year following the date of the Emancipation Proclamation, or through all the intervening years since their freedom was made a reality, nor will the discrimination be less through succeeding years, or at any time, be it near or far, so long as the white man and the black man occupy the same territory.

In this connection I wish to suggest one good reason why I gave my wholehearted support to the wage and hour law. Before the Civil War the white laboring man of the South had to compete with slave labor, and the poor white man of the South had little chance. After the Negro was freed he was more or less dependent; he was not used to his freedom; he was in desperate straits and was willing to work for any wage. Then the white laboring man of the South had to compete with the Negro freed labor of the South.

The racketeers and industrialists of that section took advantage of the situation, and held the wage scale to the very bottom throughout the years. So the white man of the South suffered just about as much as did the black man. But with the wage and hour law on the statute books, boosting the wage scale in certain industries, which will have a tendency to increase the wage scale in all industry, the white man will receive a wage which will enable him to accept the job which the poor Negro has been filling in the South, because the wage will now be sufficiently high so that the white man can maintain his standard of living in the South. So that the poor Negro who has been having the laboring job heretofore will be out of luck. We will find in the South a great army of millions of Negroes who are going to lose their jobs to white men because the wage scale has been increased.

There is another thing that is causing a grave condition in the South among the Negroes. I refer to the improvement in machinery used on the farm, and especially in the growing of cotton. We now have tractors with which to break the land, without the Negro and the mule. With a machine we lay the land off in rows, without the Negro and the mule. We distribute fertilizer and plant the seed with a machine, without the Negro and the mule. We even have cotton choppers, which do away with the labor of the Negro family. And now we have the mechanical cotton picker. So that the day of the Negro, even on the plantations of the South, is gone.

The white man will take the Negro's job in industry. There are about 8,000,000 Negroes in the South, and being of the South and one of the South, and being a friend of the Negro, I am advocating the passage of the bill I am proposing, so that something can be done to bring relief to the Negro race in the South.

Oh, we are taking care of the Negro in the South now on W. P. A., it is true. The Negroes have left the farms and are congregating in the little towns and cities of the South. They are living 10, 15, 20, sometimes 40 in one room in a house, and Uncle Sam is feeding them through the W. P. A. But that will have to end. I understand a bill is now pending here which provides that the States must contribute one-third of all the W. P. A. money. If that bill should become a law, it would mean there would be no money distributed for the Negro and the poor white man, because the States will not be able to contribute. Many of the Southern States could not make such contributions. Such a provision of law would have the same effect as the vicious, inequitable, unfair, unrighteous, almost criminal, social-security and old-age pension law which has been put on the statute books, which requires the States to contribute one-half of the old-age pension funds.

My State happens to be one of the poorer States. The result is that the old people of my State are receiving only $2.34 a month from the Federal Government, and a total pension of $4.79, whereas in the richer States, which are able to match the Federal money under the social-security and old-age pension law, the old people are receiving $15 a month from the Federal Government, and $30 altogether, with the State's $15 contribution.

I do not know who is responsible for that kind of legislation, but just a little more of that sort of laws for the South and for the poorer States and there will be a revolution. I go so far now as to state that if the Democratic Party shall be defeated in 1940, if someone will erect a tombstone, I will write the name of one man who will be largely responsible for the defeat of the party. His name is Altmeyer, and he is the head of the social-security outfit.

As repeatedly stated before, and as proclaimed by all the great students of and authorities on race relations, these two diverse peoples cannot live together upon terms of social and economic equality, and the only solution for the problem is either amalgamation or separation. The whole Nation, both black and white, revolts at the prospect of amalgamation, with the possible exception of a few thousand mulattoes. The Afro-American is just as insistent upon maintaining the purity of his blood, of perpetuating his racial integrity, as the Caucasian is unalterably committed to the proposition of keeping the white man white, and of resisting all customs, practices, and procedures, both in private and in public life, that have a tendency toward ultimate amalgamation.

I am glad to say that with two and a half million Negroes' names on these petitions they are saying, "We are not in favor of amalgamation. We do not want our blood commingled with white blood." I have respect for that class of Negro. But the element of the Negro race headed by Walter White—not all of them, of course, but a great many of them—are amalgamationists, they are miscegenationists. A large percentage of that element want white wives. They want to see white women nursing black babies—their babies. But these petitioners do not want to see any white woman nursing a black baby.

Immediately following the adoption of the declaration of independence by the people of Liberia, in convention assembled, they adopted, on July 26, 1847, a constitution for the Republic of Liberia. I see that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has come into the Senate Chamber. I desire especially to ask the Senator from Michigan to read the declaration of independence of the Republic of Liberia. It is one of the great documents of the world. A Negro is its author.

The Constitution of Liberia was closely modeled upon that of the United States. In fact in the establishment of the Republic of Liberia the Negro attempted to adopt the American Constitution in toto. He improved upon the American Constitution. The Negro in Liberia was just a little smarter than were the Americans who wrote our Constitution in 1787, because the Liberian Constitution says that no man in Liberia can vote unless he has Negro blood in his veins. The Constitution of Liberia says that no man can own land in Liberia unless he has Negro blood in his veins. So, while using our Constitution as a model, the Negro improved on it, and made a better job of it than we did.

Following a preamble declaring that in order to secure certain blessings for themselves and their posterity, and to establish justice, insure domestic peace and promote the general welfare, the people of the Commonwealth of Liberia constitute themselves a free, sovereign, and independent state by the name of the Republic of Liberia. Article I was inserted carrying 20 sections, which constituted the bill of rights. Our Bill of Rights is found in 10 amendments to the Constitution. Then followed article II, defining legislative powers, and article III, Executive powers; article IV, judicial department, and article V, miscellaneous provisions. Under the head of miscellaneous provisions, we find section 13, which reads as follows:

> The great object of forming these colonies being to provide a home for the dispersed and oppressed children of Africa, and to regenerate and enlighten this benighted continent; none but Negroes or persons of Negro descent shall be eligible for citizenship in this Republic.

Those Negroes were smart.

As originally written and adopted, this section read:

> None but persons of color shall be admitted as citizens of this Republic.

But in May 1907, this clause was amended to read:

> None but Negroes or persons of Negro descent shall be eligible for citizenship in this Republic.

"Persons of Negro descent" was intended to qualify for citizenship any person who had Negro blood in his veins. The expression "people of color" was found to be too broad in its application as it could be interpreted to mean all peoples except members of the white race, when the purpose intended to be accomplished was to make eligible for citizenship, only those people who were of African descent, wheresoever on the globe they may be found.

Mr. President, I wish to say to the colored citizens who may hear me today, or who may read my speech, that if they are resettled in Liberia they will have one consolation in knowing that they will not be troubled by the white man. They will not be troubled by a certain race, such as we find in some of the large cities, which makes a specialty of racketeering and exploiting and contaminating the Negroes.

The most gratifying thing I have read in some time had to do with the picketing in Harlem, New York, of stores that are owned by Jews. The Negroes insisted that, since the Jews were going to do the business, some members of the Negro race should be employed in those stores, and the Negroes made it so hot for our Jewish friends that they were forced to give employment to Negro boys and girls in Harlem.

I have taken the time to read some of the revised statutes of the Republic of Liberia, and I was interested to note that they have a law exempting homesteads from taxation. Section 1095 of the law says:

> Every family shall be entitled to a homestead which shall be exempt from execution. * * *

Liberia has done better than some of the States of the United States. My State just last year passed the homestead-exemption law.

> The exemption herein provided for shall continue as long as any of the heirs of the family shall occupy such homestead.

That is a word of comfort to our colored friends who are planning to go to Liberia. When they acquire homes they will be free from execution or sale.

Section 1098 says:

> Any clerk issuing any writ to seize and sell any homestead, and any sheriff who may seize and sell any homestead, or shall attempt to do so, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

That legislation is in advance of the legislation on this subject of many of the States of the American Union. Only very few, up to this time, have passed homestead exemption laws.

I was interested further to note that the laws of Liberia provide for the purchase, by the Republic, of school books for the use of the children in the various counties of the Republic. Section 947 of chapter 25 says:

> The legislature shall appropriate from time to time moneys for the purchase of primary and elementary school books for the use of the public schools. The Secretary of the Treasury shall draw special warrants to cover such appropriation, and shall make the same payable to the order of the superintendent, who shall purchase such books as may be provided for and distribute the same among the several counties according to law.

By way of recapitulation, it has been observed from this discussion that the American Colonization Society, organized, as before stated, in the United States in the city of Washington in 1817, undertook to colonize American free Negroes in Africa, and sent its first group of emigrants to that country in 1822, and established them as a settlement within the present limits of the Republic of Liberia; that the colonization society purchased practically all the territory that now forms the Republic of Liberia. It has also been shown that the American Government cooperated with the colonization society and from time to time landed its recaptured slaves from vessels engaged in the slave trade in the territory of Liberia, and provided for these recaptured slaves temporary care and sustenance. In addition to the freedmen from America and the recaptured slaves settled there by the American Government, a great many West Indian Negroes found their way also to this new country. The various settlements in Liberia, established under the auspices of the American Colonization Society and the auxiliary State colonization societies, were in the beginning entirely independent of each other—their affairs being managed by agents selected and sent out by the Home Colonization Society.

As time passed on, more and more power was granted to these various settlements by the society, and eventually they were all consolidated under the name of the Commonwealth of Liberia. Then, on July 26, 1847, the colony declared its independence and subsequently adopted a constitution, and became recognized the world over as the Republic of Liberia. The first President of the Republic of Liberia was Joseph Jenkins Roberts, who, at the time of the declaration of independence and the adoption of a constitution, was Governor of the Commonwealth of Liberia, having succeeded Thomas Buchanan, who was the Commonwealth's first Governor. Roberts was five times elected President of the Republic, and he did much toward inducing other countries to recognize Liberia as a free and independent Republic. The Republic flourished far beyond the expectations of its founders during his administration. It was recognized by other nations in the following order: France, Lubeck, Bremen, Hamburg, Belgium, Denmark, the United States, Italy, Sweden, Norway, Holland, Haiti, and Portugal. It has been said that recognition by the United States was delayed because it was pointed out that Washington would be compelled to receive a colored envoy.

About 1 year after the adoption of the constitution, and when the new government was well on its way toward the completion of its labors in setting up and placing in operation the various subdivisions of the Government, the directors of the society and the commissioners of the Republic, on behalf of the American Colonization Society and the Republic of Liberia, in the city of New York, on the 20th day of July 1848, entered into articles of agreement whereby the society ceded all of its public lands within the limits of Liberia to the Republic, subject to 10 provisions, one of which was that when the Government sells any of the public lands, every alternate lot, or farm, or section, or square mile, or miles shall be left unsold to be assigned to emigrants. It was further provided that the tracts reserved for emigrants may, with the assent of the society, be exchanged for others of equal value, or sold and the proceeds devoted to the purposes of education. It was provided also that the society shall retain the right of locating emigrants in any of the present settlements, and that any settlements are to be formed by the concurrence and agreement of the Government of Liberia and the society.

If Senators have time to read my bill, which I hope they will, they will find that I provide that the American Colonization Society, which is still an organization domiciled in Washington, shall have a part in connection with allocation of the lands acquired for the resettlement of Americans in Liberia.

The agreement stipulated that the Government of Liberia should hold the land theretofore appropriated to the Kentucky society for the occupancy of emigrants from that State, the land assigned to the Mississippi society should be held for emigrants from that State, and the Blueberrie land should be assigned to emigrants from the State of Louisiana. These several State societies were auxiliaries of the American Colonization Society. By this agreement the active participation of the American Colonization Society in administering the affairs of the people of Liberia was practically terminated, and only such rights were reserved and such cooperation in the matter of establishing new settlements was permitted as were to be found stipulated in the articles of agreement of July 20, 1848.

In other words, we already have the land in Liberia. It is being held in trust by the Republic of Liberia for the resettlement of American Negroes. My bill provides a way for the American Negroes to take possession of the land and enjoy it.

A while ago I produced a letter from the President of Liberia. He is ready to receive American Negroes. He sets out certain terms, but my bill sets out more gracious and more liberal terms than are set out in the letter from President Barclay.

It may be of interest to know that since I have been working on this problem, through the activities of the Ethiopian League, headed by President Gordon, of Chicago, two commissioners were sent to Liberia to interview the President of Liberia and definitely ascertain whether or not the President of Liberia would be willing to accept the American Negroes if the Congress should pass legislation providing for their settlement in Liberia. I am glad to say that those two commissioners returned from Liberia in January and are in the gallery today. The President of Liberia is ready to receive American Negroes.

Notwithstanding this severance of the ties which had so long bound together the settlements of the Republic and the American Colonization Society, the parent organization continued to keep in touch with the progress and development of the Republic and to cooperate in an unofficial way in directing its destinies and contributing to its growth and development by encouraging those of African descent in the United States to return to their mother country.

Only this morning I was in conference with Colonel West, who is the head of the American Colonization Society in Washington. He has made frequent trips to Liberia and is still working at the job.

Negroes then began to volunteer in great numbers for colonization in Liberia. The American Colonization Society was unable to take care of all who desired to migrate to the new-found land. Not every Negro in whose breast had risen high hopes of migration to his homeland could be transplanted by the Colonization Society. The volunteers were in greater number than the society could accommodate.

In other words, unless we can persuade the Federal Government to carry out the program, it never can be successfully and satisfactorily done. When two and a half million American Negroes, as evidenced by the petitions on my desk, are begging the Congress to give them the opportunity to avail themselves of the land which is now waiting for them, being held in trust by the Republic of Liberia, is it not better sense, is it not better judgment, is it not better business for the Government to pay for their transportation and care until they are well on their way and have been established in their new home? Is it not cheaper and better to care for them in that way than to let them stay in the United States and keep them indefinitely on the relief rolls?

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BILBO. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. How much land has been set aside for this purpose by the Liberian Government?

Mr. BILBO. One and a half million acres were specified as a start; but I am informed that several million acres are waiting, ready, and available.

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand, there is nothing in the Senator's bill which makes it compulsory upon the part of anyone to go to Liberia.

Mr. BILBO. There is not one word, one suggestion, or one intimation anywhere in the bill that suggests force, or power to make any Negro go who does not want to go. In fact, under the provisions of my bill he cannot go unless he expresses a desire to go. He must himself make the application.

Mr. DAVIS. What inducements are offered in the bill for him to go?

Mr. BILBO. The bill offers every inducement in the world in the way of financial support.

Mr. DAVIS. What financial support?

Mr. BILBO. We provide his transportation expenses and his maintenance on the way, and then we set him up with a home. We "grubstake" him. We give him money for furniture. We give him money for supplies. We pay him a dollar a day for a whole year if he is over 12 years of age, and if he is under 12 he receives 50 cents a day until he is able to start operations in his new home in Liberia. I will say to the Senator that in all the history of the world no government has ever made a more magnanimous, more gracious, or more liberal tender to a people seeking another home.

Mr. DAVIS. What would be the per capita cost to the Government?

Mr. BILBO. That question would require a very extended answer; but I think I can satisfy the Senator by stating that the cost of settling Negroes in their fatherland in Africa would be just about one-half the cost of maintaining them on the relief rolls in America.

Mr. DAVIS. Can the Senator give us an estimate of what the cost would be?

Mr. BILBO. Has the Senator read the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. I have read it hastily.

Mr. BILBO. The new bill?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes.

Mr. BILBO. The bill provides that we shall buy 400,000 square miles from France and England, the purchase price of which will be credited upon their war debts. The bill further provides that building materials and supplies necessary for the proper resettlement of the emigrants may be furnished not only by France and England but by any country in Europe which owes us a war debt, and credit will be given for the supplies furnished.

I have always been opposed—as I am sure the Senator has been—to England, France, and other European debtor nations paying the United States in goods, wares, and merchandise, because such a program would be unfair to our own industries and would paralyze our own industries. So the bill provides that the debtors shall pay us in money. They say they do not have the money; but a way is provided by which they can pay. The debtor nations have the land and the supplies and materials to help us carry out the program of resettling the unfortunate race in our midst. The nations which furnish the supplies will receive credit on their war debts. I do not remember the exact details, but my recollection is that the bill provides $300 for furniture after the emigrant has arrived at the point of settlement, $300 for something else, so much for his education, so much for his health, and so forth. The total amount involved is about $700,000 or $800,000. In addition, those above the age of 12 are to receive compensation of $1 per capita per day and those under 12 are to receive 50 cents a day for a period not to exceed 12 months, so as to give them time to become adjusted and organized and ready to go on with the problem of making a living in their new home.

The plan is very gracious; and a Negro who will accept the offer and go to Liberia will be worth more in Liberia, or in the territory we propose to buy, than 90 percent of them are worth in America today.

The situation I have outlined, and the contention by the slave-holding States that because of States' rights the Federal authorities could not aid in the movement, influenced the State of Ohio to propose a program of repatriation known as the Ohio plan. The Legislature of the State of Ohio, through the Governor of that State, sent out a request to the sister free States that the several Governors thereof submit to their respective legislatures a plan for the emancipation and colonization of slaves, the plan to be concurred in by the slave States. This history is necessary in order to place before the country the story of resettlement, and the importance of what we are now trying to do.

This plan got around the question of States' rights, which, it was thought, prohibited Federal support in the movement. Also, the plan originated by the Legislature of Ohio, stipulated that slavery might be carried on in the several States while repatriation was in progress, and that all slaves who did not volunteer to return to their native land should remain as slaves, on the ground that any such individual who did not join members of his own race in the establishment of a new government could not be considered as worthy or deserving of freedom.

I have much the same opinion of a Negro who would not accept the gracious offer of the opportunity which we are now trying to give him to establish a new home in Africa.

It so happened that the free States readily concurred in the Ohio plan, but the slave States refused to accept it. It is claimed by a distinguished author that in reality this was the first schism that occurred between the North and the South on the race question. This division of sentiment on the question of manumission and repatriation of Negro slaves placed the slave States in the most nearly indefensible position they had ever essayed to maintain. Up to this juncture the slave States apparently gave sympathetic consideration to the emancipation idea, but in the last analysis felt inclined to reject it because they feared to liberate in their midst a race whose numbers were equal to, and in most instances greater than, the number of whites. In my own State today there are more Negroes than whites. The people of the slave States were struck with horror at the contemplation of the great tragedy that would necessarily, according to their way of thinking, ensue if millions of untutored and uneducated human beings, just a few degrees advanced above a state of barbarism, should be turned loose in their midst and left free to roam at will, and at the same time be endowed with all the inalienable rights vouchsafed to the white man under the Constitution.

Then, too, there was the question of property rights. They had paid for these slaves in the coin of the realm; they felt, under any scheme of liberation, that they should be compensated for the losses that would follow general emancipation.

No doubt all Senators are aware that the majority of the Negroes of the South had been bought from our northern brethren who engaged largely in the slave trade. Abraham Lincoln never proposed a fairer suggestion in the history of the country than when he offered to compensate the South for the slaves.

Now the Ohio plan came forward and provided for the repatriation of slaves owned by the slave States, who would volunteer to migrate and that the institution of slavery should continue while the process of repatriation was being carried out. This proposition fully met the dangers apprehended from a wholesale liberation of slaves who were to remain in the territory of enslavement. It is true, the compensation idea was not considered in this plan, and it is possible the absence of any proposal in the Ohio plan to remunerate the slaveholders for the loss of their slaves contributed to their rejection of the plan. At any rate, the free States in the Ohio plan proposed a program which, if accepted, would have resulted in the establishment in these United States of a purely white nation composed of a white race—an ideal which yet must be attained if this Government is to endure and fulfill its destiny in the development and maintenance of the greatest civilization known to man.

Following the rejection of the Ohio plan a man by the name of William Lloyd Garrison arose and made a vicious attack on the American Colonization Society, claiming that it was merely an instrument of the slave power for removing only troublesome free Negroes from the United States and from the presence of their slaves. He claimed that the real purpose of the society was to make more secure the bondage over the Africans who were already enslaved. It will be recalled that the general plan of the American Colonization Society all along was to repatriate only those Negroes who were free, and those who had happened through some fortuitous circumstance to be made free. Even the slave States now accused the society of collaborating with the Garrisonian abolitionist. These attacks, both by Garrison and the slave power, would have destroyed the colonization movement of the society if the society had not been supported and defended by some of the most eminent men in the Nation. Garrison, in theory, was an advocate of the amalgamation of the two races. He was opposed to repatriation; he was in favor of emancipation, the bestowal of citizenship upon the Negro, and the hybridization of the two races. The Colonization Society, in spite of these attacks, continued to make progress until some 12,000 emigrants or more were established in Liberia. It took the Civil War to suspend its operations. The reconstruction era that followed the Civil War almost destroyed the society as an effective agency for repatriation. Reconstruction politicians were active among the Negroes with their newly acquired freedom, urging them to forget about the establishment of a nation of their own in Liberia and to make ready to appropriate to themselves the lands and properties of their former masters.

Let us now turn to that central figure around which all the incidents of the bloodiest war in history revolved—the immortal, the incomparable Abraham Lincoln. There is not a single doubt in the mind of any reputable historian that the institution of slavery was the direct cause of the Civil War. But for the deportation as slaves of these unfortunate people from the jungles of their native home in Africa to the Atlantic seaboard and finally to the cottonfields of the South, the disruption of the Union would never have been threatened and Robert E. Lee would never have had occasion to make surrender of his army to Ulysses S. Grant. No man of that memorable age was more fully advised as to the causes that were challenging the stability of the Union than was Abraham Lincoln. It is well at this point of our discussion to review the words of this great man in giving voice to his sentiments with respect to the emancipation and repatriation of the Negro race.

It will be noted in the study of his public utterances on this subject that he never spoke of emancipation without coupling with that thought the idea of repatriation. Like Jefferson, it was impossible for him to think of emancipation without uniting with that thought the idea of colonization and repatriation. As it has ever been, from time immemorial, impossible among civilized men to think of Jonathan without associating with that character the name of David, or to think of Damon without at the same time thinking of Pythias, so was it with Jefferson and Lincoln equally as impossible for either to think of emancipation without associating with that idea colonization or repatriation.

In the emancipation proclamation—that immortal document penned by Abraham Lincoln—he said:

I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States and Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy thereof, do hereby proclaim and declare that * * * it is my purpose upon the meeting of Congress to again recommend * * * the immediate or gradual abolishment of slavery * * * and that the effort to colonize persons of African descent, with their consent, upon the continent or elsewhere, with the previously obtained consent of the government existing there, will be continued.

The proposition I am advocating here today was just as important and just as much part of the emancipation proclamation as were the words that set the Negro free. Lincoln tied them together. He says:

And that the effort to colonize persons of African descent, with their consent——

My bill provides that a Negro cannot be transported to Africa unless he gives his consent by filing application indicating his desire to go. Two and a half million Negroes have filed already.

Lincoln says:

upon the continent or elsewhere, with the previously obtained consent of the government existing there, will be continued.

My bill also so provides.

That on the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1863, all persons held as slaves within any State or any designated part of a State, the people thereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then thenceforward and forever free.

In one single breath the President proclaimed freedom for the slaves and at the same time the effort to colonize them would be continued.

President Grant spent his whole administration in trying to carry out the colonization plan.

The reason some Senators and some other public men are afraid of this question is that they say it is fantastic; that it is a dream; it is a vision; it is too big a job; it cannot be done. Well, here, without any effort on the part of any man in public life to do anything about it, 20 percent of the 12,000,000 Negroes of the United States are now asking that it be done. I am safe in saying that 75 percent of the 12,000,000 Negroes in this country, if contacted and made to understand the gracious proposal we are offering to them in the effort to give them a chance at freedom and an opportunity in life for themselves and their children, would gladly accept the proposition; and the other 25 percent who might not want to go, and do not want to go now, assuming the 75 percent went, would be ready to go, because they would not then have the rank and file of the Negro race to prey upon and to exploit and to racketeer upon. What would the Negro dentist do if all the rank and file of the Negroes moved to Africa? What would the Negro doctor do? What would the Negro undertaker do? And the Negro preachers would be preaching to empty benches. They would go. As soon as the trek was started, the job would be finished.

After having read this document to his Cabinet, and while waiting for a Federal victory before publishing the proclamation to the world, the President assembled a group of free Negroes at the White House and informed them that he was about to enter upon a general program that would solve the race question through the peaceful and voluntary separation of the two races.

As a valuable contribution to this discussion and as a document that more clearly sets forth the views of the President with respect to the future status of the Negro, I quote almost in its entirety his memorable address, delivered in the the month of June 1862 to a deputation of free Negroes in the city of Washington. If any Members of the Senate have not had a chance to read this speech of Abraham Lincoln, I think they will find it very interesting. It is as follows:

Why should not the people of your race be colonized?

Lincoln is speaking to the Negroes assembled in the White House.

Why should they not leave this country? This is perhaps the first question for consideration. You and we are a different race. We have between us a broader difference than exists between almost any other two races. Whether it is right or wrong, I need not discuss; but this physical difference is a great disadvantage to us both, as I think your race suffers greatly, many of them by living with us, while ours suffer from your presence. In a word, we suffer on each side. If this is admitted, it shows a reason why we should be separated. You, here, are freemen, I suppose. Perhaps you have long been free for all your lives. Your race are suffering, in my opinion, the greatest wrong inflicted on any people. But even when you cease to be slaves you are yet far removed from being placed on an equality with the white race. You are still cut off from many of the advantages which are enjoyed by the other race. The aspiration of man is to enjoy equality with the best when free; but on this broad continent not a single man of your race is made the equal of ours.

Not then, not now.

Go where you are treated the best, and the ban is still upon you.

Whether it is in Michigan or in Mississippi.

I do not propose to discuss this, but to present it as a fact with which we have to deal. I cannot alter it if I would. It is a fact about which we all think and feel alike. We look to our conditions owing to the existence of the races on this continent. I need not recount to you the effects upon white men growing out of the institution of slavery. I believe in its general evil effects upon the white race. See our present condition. The country is engaged in war. Our white men are cutting each other's throats, none knowing how far their frenzy may extend; and then consider what we know to be the truth. But for your race among us, there could not be a war, although many men engaged on either side do not care for you one way or the other. Nevertheless, I repeat, without the institution of slavery, and the colored race as a basis, the war could not have had an existence. It is better for us both, therefore, to be separated. I know that there are freemen among you who, even if they could better their condition, are not as much inclined to go out of the country as those who, being slaves, could obtain their freedom on this condition. I suppose one of the principal difficulties in the way of colonization is that the free colored man cannot see that his comfort would be advanced by it.

Like some of the miscegenationists, they cannot now see that they would be better off, but they would be.

You may believe you can live in Washington, or elsewhere in the United States, the remainder of your lives, perhaps more comfortably than you could in any foreign country. Hence you may come to the conclusion that you have nothing to do with the idea of going to a foreign country.

This is Lincoln, still talking to the Negro.

This—I speak in no unkind sense—is an extremely selfish view of the case. But you ought to do something to help those who are not so fortunate as yourselves. * * * For the sake of your race you should sacrifice something of your present comfort, for the purpose of being as grand as the white people in that respect. It is a cheering thought throughout life that something can be done to ameliorate the condition of those who have been subject to the hard usages of the world. It is difficult to make a man miserable while he feels that he is worthy of himself and claims kindred with the great God who made him. In the American Revolutionary War sacrifices were made by men engaged in it, but they were cheered by the future. General Washington himself endured greater physical hardships than if he had remained a British subject; yet he was a happy man, because he was engaged in benefiting his race, and in doing something for the children of his neighbors, having none of his own.

That is Lincoln's speech to these Negroes at the White House. He closed his address with the following words:

The practical thing I want to ascertain is whether I can get a number of able-bodied men, with their wives and children, who are willing to go when I present evidence of encouragement and protection.

Every encouragement and protection on earth is to be thrown around the Negro as he is being resettled in Africa under the provisions of the bill I have introduced.

Could I get a hundred tolerably intelligent men, with their wives and children, and able to "cut their own fodder," so to speak? Can I have 50? If I could find 25 able-bodied men, with a mixture of women and children, good things in family relation, I think I could make a successful commencement. I want you to let me know whether this can be done or not. This is the practical part of my wish to see you. These are subjects of very great importance—worthy of a month's study, instead of a speech delivered in an hour. I ask you, then, to consider this seriously, not pertaining to yourselves merely, not for your race and ours at the present time, but as one of the things, if successfully managed, for the good of mankind—not confined to the present generation, but as—

"From age to age descends the lay
To millions yet to be,
Till far its echoes roll away
Into eternity."

The observations made by President Lincoln in this famous address, delivered at the White House to a deputation of free Negro citizens assembled from many sections of the country, did not spring from immature considerations, nor were they conceived under the pressure of passions generated by the exigencies of war; but they coolly and calmly reflected his judgment on the race problem as frequently enunciated in the early years of his political life. The address embodied views long entertained by him and arrived at years before the war clouds began to gather—views garnered from a prolonged study of racial inheritances and the ethnological differences between the two most widely diverse races on the globe. Furthermore, because of having been born in the South, he was frequently thrown in immediate contact with the colored race, and through this familiarity and intimacy with this unfortunate people he acquired a knowledge of their traits, their habits, and customs that served him well in the formulation of his policy to colonize the free Negroes of this Republic on the coast of Liberia. No man since the beginning of this Republic was more firmly convinced that this Nation could not survive if the two races were required to live in the same territory and under the same government. That is as true as heaven. As far back as 1836, when Lincoln announced his candidacy for the legislature in the State of Illinois, and when he was only 27 years old, he said:

I stand for admitting all whites to the right of suffrage who pay taxes and bear arms, and by no means excluding females.

Lincoln was a woman suffragist when he was 27 years old. This was a direct declaration favoring the limitation of suffrage to white people only.

In 1837, while discussing a resolution to the General Assembly of Illinois, Lincoln denied that Congress had power to interfere with slavery, and in doing so employed these words:

The Congress of the United States has no power under the Constitution to interfere with the institution of slavery in the different States.

Lincoln was opposed to social or political equality of the two races and inveighed against the intermarriage of whites and blacks. On this subject he spoke at Charleston, Ill., September 18, 1858, and used these words:

I will say that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races—that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of Negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality, and, inasmuch as they cannot so live, while they do remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior; and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race.

When Henry Clay, who for many years had been president of the American Colonization Society, died, Mr. Lincoln, in making a memorial address following the demise of the great compromiser, said:

If as the friends of colonization hope, the present and coming generations of our countrymen shall by any means succeed in freeing our land from the dangerous presence of slavery, and at the same time restoring a captive people to their long-lost fatherland with bright prospects for the future, and this, too, so gradually that neither races nor individuals shall have suffered by the change, it will, indeed, be a glorious consummation. And if to such a consummation the efforts of Mr. Clay shall have contributed, it will be what he most ardently wished and none of his labors will have been more valuable to his country and his kind.

In a debate with Senator Douglas on October 16, 1854, Lincoln voiced sentiments of regret that it was not possible at that time for a sudden freeing and colonization of the Negro. You will notice that he could not say "emancipation," he could not say anything about freeing the Negro, without saying something about colonizing the Negro. The two went together, as they ought to go together.

These were his words:

My first impulse would be to free all the slaves and send them to Liberia, to their own native land, but a moment's reflection would convince me that whatever of high hope (as I think there is) there may be in this, in the long run its sudden execution is impossible.

No one ever dreamed of sending all of our Negro citizens to Liberia or to other parts of Africa in a month, or in a year, or in 5 years. This is a work of possibly a quarter of a century, and it ought to be done in such a slow and gradual way as not to disturb the economic conditions of the country; and things will adjust themselves as these people are moved out.

Later on in a debate with Senator Douglas on June 26, 1857, Lincoln spoke more encouragingly as to the prospects of being able to bring about the colonization of the Negro. In this speech he employed these words:

Such separation, if effected at all, must be effected by colonization; and no political party, as such, is now doing anything directly for colonization. Party operations at present only favor or retard colonization incidentally. The enterprise is a difficult one—"but where there is a will there is a way," and what colonization needs most is a hearty will. Will springs from the two elements of moral sense and self-interest. Let us be brought to believe that it is morally right, and at the same time favorable to, or at least not against, our interests to transfer the African to his native clime, and we shall find a way to do it, however great the task may be.

I will tell you when this thing will be done. When a few more million Negroes in this country sign the petition asking Congress to give them a chance under the sun in their new home in Africa, there will not be any question about the bill passing.

In his first message to Congress, in December 1861, he proposed to colonize Negroes liberated from persons in arms against the Government—

At some place or places in a climate congenial to them. * * * If it be said that the only legitimate object of acquiring territory is to furnish homes for white men, this measure effects that object, for the emigration of colored men leaves additional room for white men remaining or coming here.

These words, uttered 78 years ago, are as applicable to the situation obtaining here today as they were to the age of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Lincoln did not believe that the Declaration of Independence meant that all men were created equal in every respect. In his speech delivered in Illinois in 1858 he made clear his understanding of the Declaration of Independence on this point by saying:

I have said that I do not understand the Declaration of Independence to mean that all men are created equal in all respects. Certainly the Negro is not our equal in color, perhaps not in any other respect. * * * I did not at any time say I was in favor of Negro suffrage. Twice, once substantially and once expressly, I declared against it. * * * I am not in favor of Negro citizenship.

Not any more than the Negroes in establishing their government in Liberia were in favor of white people having citizenship in their republic.

In President Lincoln's second annual message to Congress, submitted in December 1862, he emphasized the fact that colonization would settle forever the Negro problem.

There are two ways in which it might be settled—either separate them physically or let them remain here and amalgamate with them. Everyone is on one side of the fence or the other. Lincoln said:

Our strife pertains to ourselves and not to the passing generation of man, and it can, without convulsions, be hushed forever with the passing of one generation.

Following this observation, he then proposed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and because the right of Congress to appropriate money for colonization purposes had been challenged he submitted this observation:

Congress may appropriate money and otherwise provide for colonizing free colored persons with their own consent in any place or places without the United States.

Again, in the same second annual message, he said:

Reduce the supply of black labor by the colonization of the black laborer out of the country, and by precisely so much you increase the demand for, and the wages of, white labor.

I have heard many of the statesmen here repeatedly declare that we have problems which will stay with us; that we will always have unemployment; that because of this being a machine age and because of the exhaustion of new frontiers, our employment rolls will decrease. Then why not adopt Lincoln's theory of handling the question? It will cost less to handle it in that way, and the Negro is asking that we do it, and do it for him.

If Lincoln's advice had been heeded at the time it was given, and the supply of labor in the South had been reduced by the colonization of the black laborer, the South today would not be featured throughout the Republic as the Nation's economic problem No. 1. As Lincoln stated, the colonization of the black laborer in that section would have increased the demand for, and the wages of, white labor; just in the same proportion the supply of black labor would have been reduced.

From a careful study of these limited excerpts from the writings and public utterances of President Abraham Lincoln, it is adequately demonstrated that he did not suddenly jump at conclusions with respect to racial separation. His philosophy of the race problem was gradually developed and slowly reasoned out from the time he was 27 years old, and a candidate for the Legislature in the State of Illinois, to the day when he issued the Emancipation Proclamation. I wish again here to emphasize by repeating the fact that through all his efforts to colonize persons of African descent, he never proposed any plan for the liberation of the slaves that was not coupled with his scheme for colonization. Embodied in the emancipation proclamation itself was the solemn pledge that his efforts would be continued to colonize the slaves when liberated from their state of bondage. It has been shown that the President did continue his efforts by recommendations to Congress, providing for colonization; by attempting to obtain land upon which free Negroes might be settled; by at one time devising plans for compensated emancipation of the slaves; by obtaining an appropriation from Congress with which to begin colonization, and by an official request to the Congress for a constitutional amendment to sustain his colonization program. He considered the emancipation proclamation as a war measure, and that colonization was a post-war measure, the purposes of both being, the one the saving, and the other the perpetuation of the Union. He deemed the emancipation proclamation not only as an instrument designed for preserving the Union by destroying the slave power, but as also an act that would expedite his long-advocated concept of racial separation. He reasoned that when 4,000,000 slaves had been given their freedom in the Southland, and that when the war subsequently had been won by the armies of the Republic, the slaveholding power of the South, defeated in battle and confronted with the presence of 4,000,000 ignorant free men, unaccustomed to and incapable of exercising the duties and responsibilities of intelligent citizenship, would immediately join hands with the free States of the Union in a unified effort to bring about the complete riddance of a race that seriously threatened the political existence not only of the Southland, but of the Nation as a whole. So it happened that, when conscious that the war for the preservation of the Union had been won, he commissioned Gen. W. F. Butler, in the month of April 1865, to inquire into and give his views as to whether the Negroes could be exported.

At this juncture, Lincoln was assassinated, and until this day the hope, the dream, the aspiration of the great Emancipator has never been fulfilled.

Two of the greatest lights in the bright galaxy of all the stars that are set in the political firmament of this Republic, namely, Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln, have entertained the same concepts and ideals with respect to the solution of the Negro problem, and one of the saddest commentaries on the lives and achievements of these illustrious leaders is that the most priceless of the numberless ideals they have championed and defended has, through all succeeding years, remained an unaccomplished reality.

On the banks of the Tidal Basin here in Washington there is today being erected a memorial to Thomas Jefferson, commemorating—in time-defying granite—his contribution to the establishment, on everlasting foundations, of the greatest Republic known to civilized man. Already, on the banks of the mighty Potomac—in impressive grandeur—stands a monument done in imperishable stone commemorating the contribution of Abraham Lincoln to the preservation of the Union. Strange, is it not, that the people of this Nation should thus befittingly honor these heroic men for the incomparable services they have rendered—the one laying wisely and well the foundations of a new world democracy, and the other effecting, at a crucial moment of disintegration, the preservation of that democracy; and that they should at the same time reject, in these memorials, the cornerstone which represented the culminating ideals of both, namely, if this Nation is to endure under God, the separation of the two races and the colonization in Liberia of all citizens of African descent must be accomplished. One should be pardoned for indulging the hope that this rejected stone shall become the keystone of the arch in the construction of the Jefferson Memorial.

Jefferson and Lincoln, along with others who have devoted effective research and prolonged study to the Negro race problem, are in practical unanimity upon a three-way solution of this problem—social and political equality, resulting in amalgamation; complete segregation in this country, extending somewhat remotely the time of effectual amalgamation; and repatriation—the only remedy to be adopted that will preserve the civilization of the Caucasian race, and afford an opportunity for the Negro race to develop a civilization of its own.

I endeavored on a previous occasion, May 24, 1938, to stress the importance of reviewing and weighing, in every detail, the racial concepts of Jefferson and Lincoln, and took occasion to say that the time had arrived when this Government and those who make and execute its laws can no longer afford to ignore the accumulated wisdom of the past; to be oblivious of the teachings of history and of the warnings and admonitions of the most illustrious and renowned patriots of the past—the teachings and prophecies of those great and unselfish souls who have steered successfully thus far the destinies of this Republic.

What strange and inexplicable processes governing the mysterious workings and operations of the human mind have we fallen upon in this modern age that we cannot accept, without doubts and misgivings, the teachings and philosophies which have become our heritage as handed down to us by our great statesmen, our scientists, and recognized authorities on race culture and hereditary and social values.

It is inconceivable that any of the foremost leaders of our time should so willingly accept the fundamental principles of our Government, the basic foundations upon which rests the superstructure of our political system and the western civilization it has developed, and at the same time refuse to be guided and motivated by the men who framed and preserved for us that self-same Government, and who, while doing so, clearly and unanimously laid down the dictum that nothing is more certainly written in the book of fate than that "the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same government," and that "there is a physical difference between the white and the black races which will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality."

Especially is this fact all the more incomprehensible when the sentiments they so wisely and so well expressed have been caught up and echoed and reechoed through all the succeeding years by others no less capable, who severally, in their turn, laid hand upon the helm of state and guided with prudence and wisdom its continuing and upward course. Nor were they alone, as if in the wilderness, in their cry for redemption and deliverance from the unspeakable horrors of impending blood pollution, amalgamation, and hybridization. The bravest and the best from all sections of our common country have helped to hold high the danger signal so that the car of human progress might proceed to its destined goal without Caucasian casualty, Ethiopian extermination, or slow and imperceptible or cataclysmic disintegration of our boasted civilization.

Unquestionably, the devotion of the people of this Nation to Abraham Lincoln is sincere, but, regardless of that sincerity, the endorsement of the full and complete plan of his high purposes and noblest aspirations is withheld. The most generous reason that can be offered for failure of his devotees to follow him in his ideas no further than emancipation and the grave is that they have lost sight of his ultimate purpose—his definite goal. Every citizen who professes a devout respect for the great emancipator owes it to the memory of this sainted man, as well as to himself, to work for the consummation of his interrupted purpose. That which the assassin's bullet prevented Lincoln from accomplishing should be the mark at which those of us who have followed him should aim. Human justice, racial pride, and self-preservation cry out in a tearful plea that Lincoln's legacy be not dishonored; that the great project of colonization, following emancipation, which he had formulated, be not terminated in Ford's Theater.

Lincoln sacrificed his very life for his first step in emancipation, and whoever coopenates in taking the final step, whoever helps to complete his unfinished project by providing for the voluntary repatriation of the American Negro, will earn the everlasting gratitude of two self-respecting races and enable the spirit of Lincoln to rest content. No repatriation movement can be conducted without the name of Abraham Lincoln being associated with it. The part he played in setting the stage for the voluntary exodus of the downtrodden race should be repeated until it is known and understood by all men who seek a happy and permanent solution of the race problem. Like a theme song, it should be heard in the nature of a Negro spiritual running through the halls of Congress and wherever men are assembled to direct and determine the course of empires. It should be repeated in the ears of the listening world until every thought of Lincoln suggests his unfinished dream. It should be repeated here, within these walls, until, resonant with his long silenced voice, they may be made to intone unceasingly these words:

> Without the institution of slavery and the colored race as a basis, the war could not have had an existence. It is better for us both, therefore, to be separated. * * * I do not understand the Declaration of Independence to mean that all men are created equal in all respects. * * * I am not, and never have been, in favor of making voters or jurors of Negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with whites. * * * There is a physical difference between the black and white races which, I believe, will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality.

Those immortal words of Lincoln should be written into the minds and hearts of every American citizen.

Abraham Lincoln fell a martyr to his ideals before they could be achieved. Abraham Lincoln—the noblest friend the colored man ever had—was deterred by the assassin's bullet from giving him a liberation far surpassing that afforded by emancipation—namely, a home in a congenial clime in the land of his fathers where he could, under the guidance and protection of this Government, work out for himself a civilization and a culture to the full limit of his racial endowments and the acquisitions in point of training and development gained from his sojourn in America. How easy it is to visualize his sympathetic spirit today standing on the sidelines in sad contemplation of his shattered ideals; of a work half completed, viewing, with profound commiseration, the black man to whom he had given freedom, still without freedom, stranded, as it were, on an unfriendly shore and at the mercy of misguided agitators, today, as in 1865, who seize every opportunity to exploit him for private gain. Who is there, among the Members of this most exclusive body in the world, who will hesitate to join with two and one-half million people of African descent in a united effort to bring about the ultimate completion of Abraham Lincoln's self-imposed task?

Following the death of President Lincoln, the reconstruction era began, and through the efforts of reconstruction politicians migrating from the North into every nook and corner of the South, the activities of the American Colonization Society were paralyzed and the movement it had inaugurated so long ago became more or less devitalized.

The carpetbagger of those days, like the Communist of this day, impregnated the Negro brain with the idea that he should abandon the effort of establishing a Negro nation in a foreign land and become reconciled to his manifest destiny, which was to take over the lands and properties of his former slave owners, and also to make ready to seize the reins of government. The same idea, in slightly modified form, is being advanced by the Communists who are active in organization work among the Negroes of the South, urging them to demand all the rights made secure to the white man under the Constitution, and assuring them of the assistance of the Communists in a united effort to take over the black belt of the South, politically and otherwise. They have been encouraged by these Communists to believe that they can take possession of the farms and the industries now owned by the white people, called the capitalistic class.

Earl Browder, in a report to the New York convention of the Communist Party, on June 24, 1936, said:

> Significant progress has been made in building a united front of struggle for Negro liberation. The Negro people have learned to expect and demand from Communists the greatest sensitivity to their problems; the greatest energy in their defense; the greatest solidarity in their struggles.

In the testimony of Walter S. Steele, before the Dies committee investigating un-American propaganda activities in the United States, we find on page 321 in a volume carrying his testimony exclusively, these words:

> The Communists promise Negroes self-determination in the black belts of the country. These belts are indicated by maps and, of course, include the districts heaviest populated by the Negroes. Communists promise them confiscation of land and industries from the white owners and the turning over of them to the Negroes.

On page 323 of his testimony, Mr. Steele further stated:

> In the South those who join the Communist movement realize that such a change in sentiment as the Communists plan, if it could be brought about, will give them actual domination in such States as South Carolina and Mississippi, where Negroes are numerically superior, and could use their votes to especially good advantage. To many southern Negroes, therefore, the cunningly devised picture of social and political equality is a vision of the promised land. They are told that the plantations now belonging to the members of the white race will be divided up and given to them. In Russia members of the Negro race do not have social equality. The friendship of the Communist leaders for members of the southern colored race is purely hypocritical.

In June of 1938, less than 1 year ago, the Communists held their first all-southern conference of the Communist Party, in Chattanooga, Tenn. One hundred and thirty-three delegates, it is claimed, assembled in this city from all parts of Dixie to hear Earl Browder, the national secretary of the Communist Party, and James W. Ford, head of the Negro section of the same party. According to the further testimony of Steele, on page 324 of the Dies committee hearings, it was the expressed determination of this meeting to carry forward the Red penetration of the South during the next 12 months with renewed vigor. He further stated:

> It is the announced purpose of the meeting to accelerate the work of the Communists in the South, looking toward votes for the Negroes and the organization of more powerful labor unions in the South. It is to be remembered—> that when the "reds" mention unions they are not referring to labor organizations but to organizations which will agitate for the class struggle which will make America over as a Communist state.

Therefore the hypocrisy of the Communists of our time finds its prototype in the hypocrisy and deceit of the carpetbagger during the reconstruction period.

At the very height of the demoralizing situation that prevailed soon after the Civil War another outstanding Repatriationist arose in the person of Henry McNeil Turner, a Negro born at Abbeyville, S. C. He encouraged his race to achieve race progress through race nationality as other races had done. Turner entered the ministry and became a bishop in the African Methodist Episcopal Church. He had attracted the attention of President Lincoln, who appointed him Army chaplain for the first colored troops used in the Union Army. Following the close of the war he was sent with the reconstruction forces to Georgia, but resigned his commission and returned to the ministry. The reconstruction crowd was too hot for him. Bishop Turner was well aware of the fact that the race problem would continue as long as white women bred white children and Negro women bred Negro children. In answer to the carpetbagger's promise to the freedman of the plantation formerly owned by his master, Bishop Turner claimed that the Negro would more likely secure 400 acres of land and a hippopotamus in Africa than he would get 40 acres and a mule in America.

When the argument was advanced that the Negro could profit in this country by the achievements of the whites, and that there was no need for racial and national independence, he proclaimed that "freedom for racial initiative is a prerequisite for racial progress and in this respect the Negro would be better off in hell than in the United States."

Some Negroes are finding that out, and conditions are going to become worse.

Bishop Turner was as firmly committed to the policy of repatriation as the only solution of the Negro problem as any of the leading statesmen, scientists, and ethnologists of his time. Very definitely in line with the racial concepts of both Jefferson and Lincoln, he insisted that by separation he did not mean that everyone should go, or must go, but that there should be given or granted an opportunity for the departure of such black men and women as are self-reliant, and as are willing to go. He said further:

> This Nation, or its aggregated people, will either have to open a highway to Africa for the discontented black man, or the Negro will flinder this Government.

I cannot close these remarks about Bishop Turner without including a letter that he wrote when an old man to W. P. Pickett, who was then preparing a publication entitled "The Negro Problem—Abraham Lincoln's Solution." This letter, under date of January 12, 1907, reads as follows:

> I pray God that you will continue in the great work in which you are engaged and move this country to help the Negro to emigrate to the land of his ancestors. I have visited that continent as often as I have fingers on my hand, and it is one of the richest continents under heaven in natural resources. Millions of colored people in this country want to go. Give us a line of steamers * * * and let us pay as much as the million or more white immigrants pay coming from Liverpool, London, and Hamburg to this country, and the Negroes will leave by thousands and by tens of thousands—yes, by millions.

The question of colonizing the Negro or of separating the two races has been almost continuously agitated throughout the past century. The various proposals to accomplish this end are not characterized by any essential differences. The question of location furnished the principal basis upon which opinions widely differed. One group of colonizationists recommended that unoccupied territory held by the United States should be set apart exclusively for the colonization of Negroes. Just recently there was a movement in Chicago to organize a forty-ninth State by taking parts of certain large Western States, such as Colorado and others, and forming a State where none except Negroes could go. Another group favored the removal of Negroes to some part of the Western Hemisphere not owned and not likely to be owned by the United States. However, the most serious considerations have been entertained by the group which proposed to repatriate citizens of the United States, of African descent, to Africa, more especially to the Republic of Liberia.

Following the death of Bishop Henry McNeil Turner, Marcus Garvey, a Negro born in Jamaica, took up the movement of repatriation; and during the course of his activities he developed into the most powerful and effective advocate of race integrity and race nationality that this country or any other country has ever known. We are told by authorities who have devoted effective study to the labors of Garvey on behalf of the Negro race that he was a man of good education, and that in his youth he brooded long over the disadvantages suffered by his race. He organized a Universal Negro Improvement Association. He stressed the importance of blood integrity and race nationality. He spoke in a language that stirred the deep desire of the race for these essentials. Garvey's organization became international. It developed into a vast empire of workers devoted to the achievement of economic progress through racial integrity and race nationality. It is said that the membership of the organization at one time exceeded 6,000,000. Its membership came from many foreign countries, as well as from the States of the Union.

Garvey was the first repatriationist who succeeded in gaining to any appreciable degree the attention of the American press. As stated by Mr. Earnest Sevier Cox, this organization, in a plan to aid Liberia, believed that it had acquired certain rights in that country, and sent out a shipment of goods of the value, it is said, of $50,000, when the Liberian end of the agreement was rescinded.

At about this time other American citizens were successful in acquiring holdings in Liberia; but these other Americans, not being of Negro descent, could not become citizens of Liberia or hold title to its land. The Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. has $90,000,000 invested in a rubber plantation in Liberia on leased land. This obstacle was overcome by leasing a million acres of Liberian land for a period of 99 years. Garvey opposed the white man's occupation of Africa through the seizure of Liberian lands on long leases. He advocated the doctrine of "Africa for the Africans," and decried the white man seizing Negro Africa and holding its people in subjection there, as the white man had done elsewhere.

Garvey's enemies were legion. More especially he was stubbornly fought by the Negroes in the United States who favored amalgamation—the blending of the blood of the two races. Notwithstanding this formidable opposition, more forcefully felt through the activities of the N. A. A. C. P., Garvey succeeded in gaining a powerful hold upon the group of the Negro race which may be designated as "Afro-Americans," practically full-blooded Negroes.

Garvey made an effort to finance the Black Star Line of steamships to be used to carry Negro emigrants to Africa and to develop trade among Negro people. This unfortunate enterprise resulted in temporarily arresting his repatriation movement. He was convicted of having fraudulently used the mails to sell stock in the Black Star Line. His conviction took place just before the economic collapse known as the depression. The presiding judge denominated him as an impractical dreamer, afflicted with a Messianic complex, and considered that the innocent Negroes of the country should be protected against the vagaries and impractical schemes of the repatriation idealist.

It may be true that Garvey sold stock in the Black Star Line. It may be true that the Black Star Line went to pieces as an investment. However, there was no more reason for penalizing Garvey for selling that kind of stock than there was for penalizing bankers who flooded the country with Peruvian bonds and other bonds which were sold through the mails and which were just as worthless as the stock in Garvey's Black Star Line.

In passing, it may be well to note that shortly after Garvey's conviction multiplied millions of dollars' worth of stock issued by so-called practical men—men free from the hallucinations of a Messianic complex—proved to be as worthless as the stock in the Black Star Line. President Coolidge commuted Garvey's sentence; but since he was an alien he was automatically exiled from the United States. His imprisonment deprived him of further active leadership in the great organization he had founded. His largest group of followers was located in the United States; and because of his alienation he was powerless to carry on the great movement of repatriation.

When we consider that Garvey's work was terminated by a court conviction and subsequent deportation, we find cause for discouragement among his followers. However, the chief value of his labors lay in the quickening of a race consciousness and in the birth among his followers of a new hope for racial integrity and Negro nationality. For this service he could not be adjudged in violation of law by any court in the world, while on the other hand he was denominated a benefactor of the human race at the bar of enlightened public opinion.

The most significant thing about the achievement of Garvey is that notwithstanding the collapse of his colonization program at the zenith of its popularity, notwithstanding the loss of considerable sums of money invested by the members of his race, notwithstanding his conviction and imprisonment, followed by deportation from the country in which he had established his great organization—notwithstanding all these things and more, the movement he had originated did not die with the passing of its founder. The longing for economic freedom and progress, the yearning for the establishment of negro nationality, the burning desire to make secure racial integrity that Garvey had implanted in the souls of millions of Afro-Americans, survived. He definitely succeeded in establishing the fact that there is an overmastering impulse, a divine afflatus among the mass of Negroes of the United States for a country of their own and a government administered by themselves. Garvey was the greatest of the Negro publicists, and the most conspicuous organizer of his race.

In the wake of the Garvey movement there has appeared a new movement, unaided by the publicity of the press, which has for its purpose a single idea—to return people of African descent to their motherland, Africa. It was to be known as a "peace movement." President M. M. L. Gordon, of the Peace Movement, is a woman of marvelous courage and determination. She is successfully carrying on where Garvey left off. She has breathed new life into the cause of Negro repatriation. Through her efforts a giant memorial has been presented to the President of the United States calling for the return of people of African descent to their motherland, Africa.

I now submit the letter which President Gordon wrote to me, in which was enclosed a copy of the memorial prepared by the Peace Movement of Ethiopia. Before reading the letter I wish to say that the names of more than 2,000,000 of the petitioners which came to me were the result of the efforts of the organization led by President Gordon, of Chicago. Fifty-eight thousand more came to me through the efforts of the heads of organizations of the Universal Negro Improvement Association, which was originally founded by the Garvey organization. They are all working together for the one end, one purpose, one goal.

In 1938 I received this letter from President Gordon:

We thank you for your interest shown in our petition—

I think she meant "bill."

THE PEACE MOVEMENT OF ETHIOPIA—ONE GOD, ONE COUNTRY, ONE PEOPLE—TO RETURN PEOPLE OF AFRICAN DESCENT TO THEIR MOTHERLAND, AFRICA

CHICAGO, ILL., February 2, 1938.

DEAR SIR: We thank you for your interest shown in our petition. In your speech against the antilynch bill, three points are drawn as follows:

1. Draw the color line.
2. Set the race in some island in the sea.
3. Send them back to Africa.

Those are the proposals that I developed in the 4 days' speech against the antilynching bill, and she boils them down.

Your third solution is highly endorsed by the 1,000,000 members of the Peace Movement of Ethiopia. This will not alone settle the race problem in America, but will also solve the problems of unemployment,—problems which threaten the very foundations of the tranquility of this Nation.

There are millions of us who abhor alms, both private and public. We know that in our ancestral country we can carve a frugal but decent civilization of our own in that favorable climate and virgin soil.

These are the words of the leader of this great organization—a woman:

This organization is made up of the industrial masses, farmers, and men of skill, and in the land of our forefathers we will not only make a living for ourselves but will be free from race prejudice and discrimination.

We highly approve your opposition to the mixture of the two races, for we, likewise, detest the same thing. For a long period of time the mixing of the two races came from one side, the white man and the colored woman. But now it is coming from both sides.

Let me digress here to remark that statistics show that there are today over 20,000 Negro boys and Negro girls annually crossing the color line. I mean by "crossing the color line" that the Negro boy, say, is a mulatto and looks white, so that he gets by; he goes where he is not known, and marries a white girl, and the mulatto, or white-colored girl, goes where she is not known and marries a white man. There are 20,000 of them annually. By our indifference are we going to favor amalgamation in this country?

Since communism has established itself in this country, it is quite common to see a white woman rocking a black baby. We positively resent the mixture from either side and the only way to stop it is to separate the two races. We hope you will continue to push to the top this deportation measure, for this, and this alone, will save both your race and mine.

There are several million of us who will go back to Africa by our own consent.

As evidenced by this petition.

When the masses are once sent away, the oppositionists—

That is, the "high brows," the Negro intelligentsia—which are the classes, will be forced to follow. They cannot exploit the white people as they do their own. We, the million members of the Peace Movement of Ethiopia, solicit your support on this plan. We are enclosing a copy of our memorial, sent to President Roosevelt on November 14, 1933. We will be glad to hear from you at your own convenience. Our signatures are growing rapidly.

Respectfully,

THE PEACE MOVEMENT OF ETHIOPIA,
Mrs. M. M. L. GORDON, President,
EDMOND HOLLIDAY, Secretary.

Senator THEODORE G. BILBO,
United States Senator from Mississippi,
The Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

Those are the sentiments of the heads of this organization who make this appeal to be sent to Africa.

I now direct the attention of the Senate to the memorial, the one I have before me being a copy of the one sent to the President of the United States, and which today bears actually a little over two and a half million names.

A MEMORIAL

Whereas the Congress has empowered the President to exercise his judgment in the present crisis in a manner suited to the exalted office and provided him with the means to execute his plans for the amelioration of distress and the restoring of normalcy; and

Whereas the distress of the unemployed is most severely felt by such of the uneducated American Negroes who abhor alms, both public and private, in any guise; and

Whereas the removal of a half million of the poorest from a competitive labor market, at this time, would tend to relieve to that extent the condition and opportunities of the remainder;

Therefore we, the subjoined signatories, American citizens of African extraction, individually and collectively, join in respectfully petitioning the President to consider our proposal, confident that his conclusions will be for the best interests of our families and of the community at large.

WHO WE ARE

They undertake to tell the President who they are.

We desire to make it clear, first of all, that this is not a "racket" or scheme for the enrichment or self-glorification of any group or individual. The signatories pay no dues or other fees and the officers of the Peace Movement of Ethiopia serve entirely without pay, meeting their expenses wholly out of their own meager resources. Nor do our plans involve the taking over of any Government funds. We propose that the Federal Government itself meet directly such initial expenditures as launching of adopted plans involved.

We are of the so-called North, most of us having been driven from a cruel and avowedly intolerant South to the cities and towns of the Middle West, "the bread basket of America," without a just opportunity to earn a livelihood in our abject new state. We are the simple-minded, sincere, lowly, law-abiding workers who have maintained traditions of simple honesty, industry, and frugality as much from choice as from necessity. Few of us have any education, but we have learned not to heed the blandishments of self-seeking politicians, impostors, and the unworthy and undesirable products of a hectic civilization that is foreign to our nature.

We recognize the fact that there are exploiting elements in partisan politics, in industry and commerce, and even among our own people, who oppose the movement laid before the President hereinafter. But the wreckage of cupidity and intrigue strew the spectacular path of our race wherever a concerted movement for our betterment has fallen prey to crafty leadership in the past. We have avoided even our own self-seeking racial leaders.

We have a vivid realization of the hardships and toil that the fruition of our plans in a strange land entails. But we are inured to toil, and the ultimate goal of social and economic freedom gives us heart to welcome the hardships for our children's sake.

For these reasons we are not sponsored by self-styled leaders and come before the President unheralded but with alert minds and clean, calloused hands. Should the President require further information about our numbers, our need, our earnestness, and fitness for the proposed undertaking, we entreat him to seek such information among those who hold themselves in readiness to join in the execution of the plans hereinafter proposed.

WHAT WE ASK

We were torn from our original homes and kindred people against our will; but the pride of ancestry and homing instinct survive the whip and social ostracism; they are as strong in our bosom as they are in the hearts of other races. We fully understand that social and political equality of races is as repugnant to the dominant race in America as it is to the dominant races elsewhere in the world. Yet race consciousness and contempt for previous servitude bid fair always to oppose each other at the behest of those who trade on them. The ever-possible bloodshed is as abhorrent to our stricken people as it is to other law-abiding citizens.

Hungry, cold, and miserable, the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness in America appears futile. Given an opportunity in our own ancestral Africa, the knowledge of farming and simple farm machinery and implements, which we have acquired here, would enable us to carve a frugal but decent livelihood out of the virgin soil and favorable climate of Liberia, or such other well-disposed country, where the Federal Government, in its wisdom, might acquire a footing for us.

We most respectfully ask that the Federal Government negotiate with the Liberian Government for such land as existing treaty rights entitle us to, sufficient to colonize the entire body of the signatories hereto and finance the movement to the extent desirable for ultimate success. The details of our projected plans have been worked out tentatively, subject to the revision of a benign government.

We respectfully ask that the President graciously have this matter investigated now, with a view to fulfilling the expressed desires of Abraham Lincoln in this respect. We are a liability now and any cost of this project, no matter how great, would still, we sincerely believe, be a sound investment for the American people. We might require a guidance of some of the Departments of the Federal Government, for a brief period, but even if that be denied us, we could acquit ourselves with credit to the land of our tutelage, provided only the material aid is supplied to meet the first financial and mechanical requirements. A selective army of pioneers can be recruited from our ranks for the preparatory work on the ground.

We have no utopian dreams of elevating the entire Negro race, no disconcerting requests in behalf of those Afro-Americans who prefer to remain here. We submit only what we consider a practical and practicable remedy for an acute ailment of American social and economic life. We, the subjoined and accompanying signatories, merely ask respectfully that we be eliminated from an overcrowded labor market and given a helping hand in establishing such social and economic independence as we are fitted for—establishing it where it will give no offense and where it may serve as an object-lesson to tempt those who remain.

The colonial activity of America has always been based on benevolent paternalism, and we respectfully ask that this administration interest itself in like manner in behalf of those Africans whose forbears were brought here forcibly and who are now stranded here amid uncongenial surroundings.

We await the call.

THE PEACE MOVEMENT OF ETHIOPIA,
MRS. M. M. L. GORDON, President.
EDMOND HOLLIDAY, Secretary.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

Dated at Chicago, Ill., November 15, 1933.

Let me say, in response to that memorial to the President, which is to the Congress as well, and to the Government as a whole, that I am impressed with the fact that this Government has been very liberal to persons who are not truly Americans. We have only to remind ourselves of what we have done for Cuba, what we are still doing for Cuba, what we have done for the Puerto Ricans, what we have done for the Hawaiians, and for the Filipinos. Today we are penalizing our own beet and cane-sugar makers for the benefit of the Cuban sugar grower and for the benefit of the Puerto Rican; yet these people, our own citizens, are asking that something be done for them.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has stubbornly fought every movement having for its purpose either the segregation of the white and black races in the United States, or the repatriation of the Negro race to Africa. The fact is, this organization is definitely and unmistakably committed to the principle of amalgamation. Marcus Garvey has written, since his deportation, that despite the opposition of the United States Government—referring to the court sentence that resulted in his forced return to his native country—and the Society for the Advancement of Colored People, more than a million Negroes had signed up, and were ready, willing, and anxious, under his plan of repatriation, to take ships for Africa. It is said that when Garvey spoke to the Negroes of New York, at the time of the greatest popularity of his movement, not a hall in that great city was large enough to contain the crowds that desired to hear him.

Just a short while ago I received a telegram from a leader of the Negroes in New York saying that a mass meeting of 10,000 persons had endorsed the bill I am introducing.

The N. A. A. C. P., because of having as Garvey declared, put him in the penitentiary through the decision of a judge presiding at his trial who was a member of the Society for the Advancement of Colored People, capitalized the failure of the Garvey program by proclaiming to the world that amalgamation was the preferred solution because the repatriationist's theory had been stranded upon the rocks for lack of support of the white race, and that now, in no distant future, the two races will merge through slow gradations into a mulatto type, or a brown race.

This week I received from a Negro educator in Kentucky a letter in which he said that in 75 years we would not have any race problem. In other words, he has been led to believe that the process of amalgamation will be so rapid that the race problem will be settled in 75 years. I admit that the process is rather speedy.

With Garvey exiled, and Gordon for so long a time ignored, the amalgamationists felt confident that a permanent victory had been won, and that a mulatto race would develop without appreciable opposition by the whites or the full-blooded Negroes. Strange to say, there are not many white people who are aware of a divided opinion among the Negroes on the subject of amalgamation. As a rule it is assumed by the whites that all Negroes prefer to lose their race identity by a mixture of the blood of the two races. This is untrue, as is clearly shown by the resolution prepared by the peace movement under the direction of President Gordon, and delivered to the President, and to which memorial there are subscribed the names of more than a million Afro-Americans. As evidenced by this memorial and the letter accompanying it that President Gordon addressed to me in February, and as further evidenced by the teachings of a long list of eminent Negro leaders, the Negro is as capable of experiencing pride in his race, and of fostering an innate desire to stand alone and apart in a unified effort to attain race nationality, and thereby preserve racial inheritance, as other races have shown ability to accomplish similar purposes.

The memorial signed and sent to President Roosevelt by President Gordon, of the Peace Movement, served to threaten again the security felt by the amalgamationists. They are beginning to recognize this gigantic movement of repatriation, revitalized by the indomitable spirit and unflagging courage and determination of President Gordon, as another Banquo's ghost appearing upon the scene of action. President Gordon's plan does not contemplate an enforced exodus. It seeks to provide an opportunity, through Federal aid, for transportation and settlement in another land of only those American citizens of African descent who are willing to go. It is wholly voluntary. Certain reasons are cited showing the advisability and desirability of the American Negro seeking an opportunity to demonstrate to the world that he is capable, if given proper encouragement through Federal aid, of establishing a government of his own under which he will be privileged to enjoy all the rights—political, social, and economic—that are denied him when forced to live under a system of government controlled and administered by any other race.

President Gordon regards with horror the sight of white women rocking black babies in this country. You have seen it in Harlem, Mr. President. Since communism has been active in establishing itself in this Republic, she regards with grave apprehension the strong tendency in certain sections, among certain organizations, to bring about the amalgamation of the two races.

The question of unemployment in this country is not overlooked by this great leader of the Negro race when she says:

The peace movement to Ethiopia will not alone solve the race problem in America but will also solve the problem of unemployment, which today threatens the very foundations of the tranquillity of this Nation.

A parallel civilization between two diverse races is an impossible achievement. The two races cannot run along parallel and equal. One or the other will dominate or else the two will amalgamate. There is not a single ethnologist who does not predict that eventually the blacks, if given full rights with the whites, will be absorbed by the whites. Some scientists claim that this condition will come about very soon, while others contend that it will require hundreds of years; but all are agreed that miscegenation will result if the Negro is given every chance that the white man is given to develop in this country. Mixed schools, mixed hotels, such as provided by the laws of Pennsylvania, and intimate social relations between whites and blacks will hasten race blending, as shown by the great increase of mulattoes in the cities of the West and North, far exceeding any such increase in the South; and Washington is not far behind. White girls working in some of the departments in Washington are married to and living with Negro men, since they can marry here without violating the law.

There is no doubt that the presence of the Negro in the South is responsible for that section of our country being called "the No. 1 economic problem of the Nation." The whites have been migrating from that section by the millions within the last score of years. The best blood of the white race in the South, when trained and educated for the duties and responsibilities of outstanding citizenship, observe, after casting their eyes over a benighted land, cursed with a race problem, a lack of opportunities to discharge these duties with any degree of efficiency. Consequently they migrate to sections of the country where the free and full exercise of talent and qualifications will count most. Therefore the southern population becomes to an alarming extent depleted because of the migration of the best element of the white race to other sections of the United States.

Between 1900 and 1930 more than 3,400,000 of those born in the Southeastern States have moved to States outside that region. It is estimated that since 1900, 3,800,000 have left the Southeast entirely, and only 400,000 have come in from elsewhere, still leaving, as before stated, a loss of 3,400,000. Just what the estimated value of this human wealth lost to the South would be depends upon the per capita estimate of capital wealth. At an appraisal of one-half the maximum used by economists, the aggregate would approach the present stupendous debt of the Nation. To be more specific, the migration of whites, due primarily to the presence of the Negro, in 30 years has cost the South $60,000,000,000.

Still another loss is sustained because of this migratory movement, and that is that many of the most ambitious and venturesome citizens join in this gigantic trek, leaving behind many who are satisfied to take their ease. The result is that to a large extent the South is underpopulated in desirables and overpopulated in undesirables. This is a serious charge for a Senator of the United States to make against his people. There is no excuse, other than the Negro problem, for the South's lack of advancement, educationally and industrially, as compared with other sections of our country.

Take, for example, the 11 Southeastern States, which have an unexcelled climate and embrace 17 percent of the Nation's area; yet in material development they lag. Of the 100 great banking systems throughout the country this region has only 3, and its deposits are less than 1½ percent. There are 161 units in the 29 concentrated areas of iron and steel, and the South has only 5 of this number. This region has 28 out of the 195 units of food concentration. There are 30 great industrial areas in the United States, and not one is to be found in the 11 Southeastern States. The income and wages of this section are from 30 percent to 50 percent below normal. It is estimated that 20,000,000 tons of potash and nitrogens and phosphates are annually washed out of the soil. Forty-five percent of the eroded lands of the Nation are in this section. The profits of the farms are taken up in the purchase of livestock, farming implements, and especially fertilizer. Five and one-half million tons of fertilizer, costing $161,000,000, are purchased annually in the South, while the rest of the Nation buys only $500,000 worth of this commodity. The wealth per capita is about one-half the Nation's average. We might go on indefinitely through a category of lost and wasted opportunities in the South.

Notwithstanding these unfavorable and highly deplorable conditions, the South surpasses all other sections of the country in natural advantages. The 11 Southeastern States embrace 40 percent of desirable farm lands, 40 percent of the commercial forests, 98 percent of the yellow pine, 43 percent of the hardwood, 61 percent of the marble, 10 percent of the pig iron, and 100 percent of the soapstone. Think of these 11 States enjoying these favorable advantages over the entire remaining sections of the country.

Fuel and water power in these States are of such regional excellence as exists in no other part of the Nation. This section, inclusive of the Southwest, furnishes 65 percent of the Nation's petroleum, 50 percent of the natural gas, 98 percent of the natural phosphate, 99.9 percent of the sulphur, and 43 percent of the borate.

The water power of the southeast develops 16,000,000 horsepower, a total that equaled the Nation's output in 1930. Here we have a section of country that is far above the average in natural resources, yet it is far less developed. Why this lag? I am constrained to believe that the original cause was slavery, followed by the presence of the freedmen, then by Reconstruction, and finally the loss of a great part of the desirable population due to the handicap directly traceable to the presence of an enormous Negro population.

My attention has recently been directed to a letter written by Kelly Miller to ARTHUR W. MITCHELL, a Member of Congress from the Black Belt of Chicago, Ill., which letter, and his reply thereto, the Congressman had published in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 488. This letter undertakes to depict the deplorable condition of the Negro in this country, and to discourage the further migration of the Negro from the farms of the South to the cities of the North. While I do not know that Miller is a Negro, I assume from the tone and purport of his letter that he is. I quote from Miller's letter:

Even where he—the Negro—is engaged in recognized pursuits which demand shorter hours and higher wages, he constitutes in the main, a marginal worker demanding less skill and lower pay. Under the pressure of competition, even in agriculture and domestic service, the Negro is being pushed down to the bottom or pressed out at the side, and therefore is becoming less and less indispensable.

Again he says:

Race prejudice as severely restricts the Negro's industrial opportunities in the North as it does his political and civil rights in the South. * * * One shudders to predict the future of a Negro child brought up in a seven-story flat of a Harlem tenement house.

Again I quote:

The invasion of the boll weevil and the coming of the World War threatened to shift the Negro population from the farm to the cities, both in the North and the South, but the hegira was short lived after the boll weevil had ceased to threaten cotton production and the soldiers had returned from the World War to their places in the mechanized industries of the South, the Negro looked around and, like Othello, found his city occupation gone.

He goes on to say, further, that the Negro's plight in the industrial and economic world has been emphasized by the depression, and that a disproportionate number of the 10,000,000 unemployed in this country is represented by the Negro race; and then adds, to use his own words:

The cities * * * have now as many Negroes as they can hold in solution without a dangerous precipitation. He must have a greater faith in the future than I can command who can foresee any way out for the city contingent of the Negro race. It is unthinkable that they should continue for ever, or for long, to live on charity and relief.

Before closing these observations on the letter written by Kelly Miller, I wish to give one quotation from the reply to the letter sent by Representative MITCHELL:

> It is my opinion and observation that nowhere in the United States of America has the Negro been given equality before the law and equality in the economic affairs of the Nation.

Are not these remarkable statements to be made by outstanding leaders of the Negro race after the Negro has lived in this country for 300 years? If, within a period of time covering a century and a half, the Negro has been willfully and designedly denied the rights and privileges secured to the white race under our Constitution, how can he, at this advanced stage of our growth and development, entertain the faintest hope of enjoying the blessings of society and the benefits of government such as have been provided by the white man for a white civilization?

I recall again in this connection the words employed by President Lincoln when addressing a deputation of free Negroes at the White House. He said:

> I think your race suffers greatly; many of them by living with us while ours suffers from your presence. * * * We suffer on each side. If this is admitted, it shows a reason why we should be separated. You here are free men. * * * Perhaps you have long been free. * * * You are yet far removed from being placed on equality with the white race. You are still cut off from many of the advantages which are enjoyed by the other race. The aspiration of man is to enjoy equality with the best when free, but on this broad continent not a single man of your race is made the equal of ours. Go where you are treated the best and the ban is still upon you. I cannot alter it if I would.

I ask my colleagues to pardon me for requoting still another statement from the Great Emancipator:

> I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the political and social equality of the white and black races. I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of making voters and jurors of Negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say, in addition to this, that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality.

I cannot refrain from associating these words of Abraham Lincoln with those memorable lines uttered by Thomas Jefferson:

> Nothing is more certainly written in the Book of Fate than that * * * the two races, equally free, cannot live in the same government.

Jefferson and Lincoln, although separated in time of service by many years, occupy a position in history with respect to the repatriation of the American Negro very similar to the one occupied by Moses and Aaron with respect to the exodus of the children of Israel from an Egyptian bondage not entirely dissimilar in point of denied social and political rights and undesirable living conditions to the lot of the American Negro under the Government of the United States. Both Moses and Aaron repeatedly petitioned the Pharaoh of their time to "let my people go" in order that they might return to the land of Canaan. They prophesied frequently the visitation of numerous plagues upon the land of Egypt if the government of Pharaoh continued to insist that the Israelites, a minority group denied the rights and privileges of the high-born Egyptian, should be forced to live in a land populated with a people of wholly diverse racial values.

Jefferson and Lincoln likewise prophesied with respect to the calamities that would befall a nation of people composed of two races so entirely unlike in their racial inheritances. In Egypt, due to the presence of the Israelites, according to the prophecies of Moses and Aaron, the rivers ran with blood. Then came the plague of frogs, lice, flies, murrain, boils with blains from the scattered ashes flung into the air, hail, locusts, impenetrable darkness, and, last, the death of the first born in every home of the land, except where the blood of the lamb was sprinkled on the two side posts and on the upper door posts of the houses, in which event the Angel of Death would pass over and spare the first-born of that home.

Already, according to the warnings and admonitions of Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln, plagues have been visited upon those sections of our common country where the white race and the black race have been forced to live side by side. As a result of the Civil War, due to the presence of the Negro, our rivers have been made to run with the blood of the best and the bravest. Already has the most favored part of the Nation in point of climate and natural resources been visited by the boll weevil and divers other insects, which left a devastation in their paths greater by far than that which lay in the wake of the flies and the lice and the locusts which settled like an ominous cloud upon the land of Egypt. Neither has this fair clime, peopled with the purest blood of the Caucasian race, been spared the "boils with blains." It has suffered through the spread of a syphilitic infection far more deadly than the contagion of the putrid scourge that afflicted the kingdom of Pharaoh.

I call upon Congress now to renew the covenant of Abraham Lincoln to return the children of Ethiopia to their motherland, Africa, lest we may yet experience the consequences attendant upon the visitation of some angel of death that will strike down into cold and lifeless clay the first-born in every home of the land. I call upon Congress to open the channels of the sea for the passage of Ethiopians into the land of Liberia; and if this be accomplished, I warn any hostile band of Pharoah against any attempt to pursue them with horse and chariot lest the waters of the deep envelop them in universal ruin.

Mr. President, while craving the Senate's patience for indulging in Biblical allusions, I wish to present one other I have in mind which seems to me to have a special bearing upon the subject of repatriation. It will be recalled that Ishmael and Isaac, although circumcized as fellow heirs of the same covenant, could not dwell together as equals in the same house. Sarah, the lawful wife of Abraham, has ever been thought cruel in her methods. Hagar, her servant slave and companion, whom Sarah—at that time childless—had given to Abraham that children might be born to his tribe, was tearful and submissive and was obsessed with the conviction that Ishmael, her son, could not attain unto blessings promised unless they were sent forth as Sarah had demanded after the birth of Isaac, her first-born; and so it happens in this day, in this year of our Lord, that the seed of the bondwoman here is coming to the conclusion that it cannot work out its destiny and obtain its inheritance in the midst of the seed of the free woman. Notwithstanding all laws that are passed for the purpose of securing equal social, political, and economic rights among the citizens of this Government, these two races, the black and the white, cannot live together as equals. How can we hope for the achievement of a parity condition in point of personal rights and liberties when there is no case in all history upon which such a condition or achievement can be predicated. Antagonism between the races, an inborn prejudice on the part of the whites, coupled with the birth of a growing self-respect among the blacks, an awakened ambition for race nationality, and an innate loyalty to race inheritance are causing the Afro-Americans to lower their hands that have been held high for a century and a half in suppliant pleadings to an indifferent Government, established and administered by the white man, and are urging the Negro to turn his face to the land of his fathers where he can exercise the rights and enjoy the security for so long a time denied him. They are thinking in mass of the land of their fathers, of the continent that God himself gave to their race, where their destiny is yet to be fulfilled.

Many have not yet heard of the Christian Republic of Liberia, whose standing among the nations of the world is acknowledged and whose fascinating history, fertile lands, free institutions, and equal opportunities invite them; where personal development, race nationality, and race loyalty will find an easy and permanent solution. More than 2,000,000, however, have learned of this land of equal opportunities and unclouded future. They are sending petitions, growing in number of signatories, daily to our Government, praying for the helping hand of this rich and powerful Nation to strengthen and support them in their consuming desire to return to the land that the Great Emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, had pledged himself to provide for them. As if coming through the invisible ether, I can hear their message radioed, as it were, to this body that will soon sit in judgment on their fate, saying:

We, the Negroes of the United States, are burdened with conditions which to us are no longer endurable. Our American citizenship is a sham; our presence is endangering the peace and integrity of your Nation; our natural increase will in time threaten to push you overboard and wreck your great ship of state. Our growing population should be more alarming and disconcerting to you than the almost $50,000,000,000 deficit in your Treasury. We outnumber you in some States. There is a black belt in Chicago, in New York, in Detroit, in Philadelphia, in St. Louis, and in the Mississippi Delta, and as we expand, you are rapidly and necessarily departing. With you, we have learned, we cannot form one homogeneous people, neither can our race dwell with you together on an equality. Send us back to Africa, that we may do our long-delayed divinely appointed work. We do not ask for all to go at once. Just send those who are now willing to go and whose training, education, experience, and character will add new luster to the star of the Liberian Republic, already founded by the beneficence of your Government. Start the emigration by Government aid. Acquire new territories adjacent or contiguous to Liberia so that in time all citizens in your country of African descent may find a home in the motherland and there be privileged to work out their own salvation and the redemption of benighted Africa.

With such a plea coming from the multitudinous voice of 2,000,000 Afro-Americans, how can we be more rebellious than Pharoah of Egypt?

I trust my bill, designed to furnish an opportunity for Negroes or persons of Negro descent in this country to migrate to the West Coast of Africa, will have favorable consideration by the committee to which it may be referred and if a favorable report is made on the measure and it is placed upon the calendar of the Senate and here comes up for further consideration, I shall avail myself of the opportunity to discuss, in some detail, every provision of the bill.

At this time, I shall touch upon only two features of the measure, namely, section 102 of title I and section 201 of title II.

Section 102 reads as follows:

SEC. 102. It is hereby declared to be the intent of Congress that the benefits and provisions of this act shall apply to citizens of the United States who may qualify as eligible for citizenship in the Republic of Liberia and who, by their physical fitness and climatic adaptability may qualify as migrants to be permanently settled in the territory hereinafter provided for and who shall have voluntarily expressed a desire to become emigrants under the provisions of the act.

There can be no doubt but that this section distinctly designates the Negro and persons of Negro descent as the beneficiaries of the act.

The word "Negro" is nowhere mentioned in the bill. It provides only for those who can qualify for citizenship in Liberia, and before one can qualify for citizenship in Liberia he must be of Negro descent. The expression, "physical fitness and climatic adaptability," taken with the statement that "only persons who are eligible for citizenship in the Republic of Liberia may qualify as an applicant," unmistakably points to the Negro, exclusive of any white person, as the individual entitled to any of the benefits of the act.

In article 5, section 13, of the Constitution of the Republic of Liberia, these words are to be found:

None but Negroes or persons of African descent shall be eligible for citizenship in this Republic.

The purpose of the act, therefore, is to establish a government on the West Coast of Africa sufficiently large in territorial boundaries to take care of the Negroes of the United States—a government where Negroes only can enjoy the rights of citizenship and where Negroes only shall participate in the administration of its political affairs.

Title 2 of the act provides for the liquidation and settlement of the war debts due to the United States by the debtor nations. The act contemplates negotiations to be conducted by the United States with Great Britain and France, with a view to purchasing not to exceed 400,000 square miles of territory from those countries, such lands to be contiguous to the Republic of Liberia and so situated as to form an undivided area to be known as the Republic of Greater Liberia. The territory to be acquired will necessarily come from the Ivory Coast and French Guinea, owned by the French Government, and from the Gold Coast and Sierra Leone, owned by Great Britain. The act provides that the purchase price of this territory, not to exceed 400,000 square miles, shall be paid by crediting the agreed purchase price against the war debts owing to the United States by the countries from which such territory is purchased. The debts of foreign nations owing to the United States by virtue of loans made by the United States during the World War now loom so high as to make those obligations one of the most troublesome problems facing this country and its debtor nations.

It is universally admitted that the only way to discharge a war debt obligation is through payment in goods or services by the debtor to the creditor. Our debtor nations are unable to pay their obligations to us either in silver or gold. There is insufficient gold in the world to liquidate the debts due us by foreign nations. As a matter of fact, no international loan in the financial history of the world was ever paid by transfer of money. That is a fundamental economic fact. Regardless of this fact, the nonexistence among our debtor nations of a sufficiency of gold to pay their obligations to us takes a gold settlement completely out of the picture. The only alternative, then, is for this Nation to accept goods and services, but it would be detrimental and downright destructive to the welfare of our country to accept settlement in goods and services, because our country is a highly industrial one, and the consumption market here is already glutted from an overproduction of American-made goods. To accept the manufactured products of a foreign nation would therefore be disastrous to the economic life of the United States.

France and England, our greatest debtor nations, would gladly discharge their obligations to us if it could be done with goods and services, but as before stated, the United States cannot afford to accept settlement in this manner because it would be suicidal for American industries and to our economic stability. The disastrous economic effect that such settlements have upon a creditor country is today a matter of common knowledge. When the French settled their war indemnity to Germany in 1871, there followed such an economic depression in Germany that Bismarck remarked: "The next time I defeat France I will insist upon paying her an indemnity."

Following the World War, when Germany began to build merchant ships for England, the British shipyards were thrown out of work. When the Germans began to hand over ships and goods on account, their reparation, instead of a blessing, proved to be a disaster.

My bill provides for an American consumption market in Africa where no evil effects, as a consequence, would appertain to home-consumption markets. It so happens that the two largest debtor nations, Great Britain and France, are also the two largest landholders on the globe. Never before in the history of the United States and these debtor nations has there been a time when their interests have been more nearly identical, and when the destiny of all is bound up in the destiny of any one of them. The aggressive tendency of totalitarian states threatens the permanency of democratic institutions the world over. This troublesome question of war debts is the only problem that strikes a discordant note in the harmony which these three great democracies are endeavoring today to establish as a common defense against the encroachments of the totalitarian states.

If the syndicated articles of Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen are to be credited as they pertain to some of the underlying purposes of Hitler and Mussolini, it would be well to weigh carefully what these gentlemen have to say about the "Conference on Raw Materials," as set down in their syndicated article of March 3; I quote:

No diplomatic overtures have been made officially but an extremely significant deal to carve up Africa will be sprung by Hitler and Mussolini soon. Keep your eyes open for a "conference on raw materials" or some other high-sounding name. This will be suggested in the near future by the Rome-Berlin axis, and to the conference will be invited not merely Europe's four main powers but Poland and Spain. Colonies for Poland have been discussed recently by Von Ribbentrop, Nazi Foreign Minister, and the Polish Foreign Minister, Colonel Beck. Mussolini will also demand new colonies for his minion, General Franco. What Germany has in mind to satisfy its raw-material craving is a slice of Africa extending from French Senegal on the west coast of Africa to around Lake Chad, and then south to the Belgian Congo. This would include Liberia, an American Negro free colony, Nigeria, and large chunks of French territory. * * * The means of providing these raw materials may be tough for the French and British palate. Mussolini and Hitler would also demand some African territory for their new Fascist ally, Spain. What will be asked for Poland is not yet known. Germany will not be asking for the return of her old African colonies but considerably more than her pre-war holdings for herself and her allies.

If credence is to be given to this statement, it follows that the time is now ripe to extend to France and Great Britain an opportunity to settle their war debts by the transfer of the territories contemplated in the bill to the United States of America, and thereby deal Germany and her allies a blow not altogether dissimilar to the one that Napoleon dealt to Great Britain by selling to the United States, for a paltry sum, the Louisiana Territory.

Assume that the bill passes and at the present time negotiations with debtor nations result in our failure to acquire lands now owned by the debtor nations contiguous to Liberia. Still the fact really should not be overlooked that successful negotiations resulting in acquiring these properties may be undertaken and consummated at some future time, if not now. The bill will enable representatives of the democracies to give consideration to our war debt proposal wherever and whenever they may be gathered around the council table. Under the terms of the bill, regardless of the success of our negotiations to acquire additional territory, the repatriation movement to Africa can begin and continue when the proper negotiations are completed between the United States and the Republic of Liberia. The success of the repatriation movement is not entirely predicated upon our success in acquiring the additional territory.

I sincerely hope that every Member of this body will read and give careful consideration to the provisions of the bill. It is not the product of minds afflicted with a Messianic complex. It is a rational and realistic formula for the solution of the race problem in the United States. The bill has been prepared with the cooperation of the friends of the movement. It has been reviewed and approved by the best legal minds of the Nation, men who are in sympathy with the end to be achieved. May the Congress give to the measure the sympathetic consideration it deserves.

Mr. President, in further support of the contention that the best thing this Government could do would be to negotiate with France and England to take over this territory, I submit an article appearing in the magazine Liberty, of March 18, written by Walter Karig, under the head of "Does Hitler Want America Next? Here is the Evidence—and the Inside Story of What We Are Doing About It."

A reading of the analysis and report of the position of the Department of State, the Navy Department, the War Department, and the Department of Commerce makes it perfectly clear that if the dream of Hitler is to be realized—and we all know that he is dreaming—he is seeking to secure and will demand a foothold on the West Coast of Africa, which, with the Canary Islands, will provide a place where he can harbor his submarines, build his airfields, place his ammunition, his men, and his materials of war, and thus gain control of the lanes of trade of the United States with South America, to enable him to jump on and off at will. That is his dream; and that is why, if we mean what we say, we must stand by the Monroe Doctrine, because that step is essential in order to prevent the consummation of Hitler's dream, his machinations, and his plans. I think I do the cause of good government a service by asking unanimous consent that the article from Liberty be inserted in full at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to say that the fight to solve the race question by separation, and by the orderly, friendly, and voluntarily resettlement of the Negroes of this country in Africa, has just started. This is only the beginning. I have religiously followed the text of my prepared address because I propose to give it the widest possible circulation.

I am satisfied that 75 percent, or 8,000,000 of the 12,000,000 Negroes in America, are desirous of the opportunity to establish their home in their fatherland because they are now conscious as never before of the discriminations, the abuses, the oppression, and the lack of opportunity which have been their experience, not only in the South but in the North. Their condition in the North is worse than it is in the South. I understand that the city of Birmingham permitted Marian Anderson to sing in its auditorium. I know that the city of Jackson did; but when she came to the great cosmopolitan city of Washington, the seat of government, which is supposed to be the Negro's paradise, she was not even permitted to sing in a school building, or in the D. A. R. auditorium, or anywhere else. She sang in the open.

The condition I have described is only indicative of a spirit which is growing throughout the Nation. I am sorry to say that this country is not free from the race hatred and race prejudice which we have seen so bitterly demonstrated in Italy and in Germany. There is the same rising tide of opposition to various races which live in the United States. For 300 years the poor Negro race has known that the feeling has been against it. After 300 years of trial side by side with the white man it has discovered that conditions are not becoming any better, but are becoming worse. That is why we find two and a half million Negroes pleading for the opportunity to be placed in a country they can call their own.

I am just as confident that the problem will be solved as I am that the sun shines in the heavens today. There is now only one thing in the way of a solution, and that is the fact that politically the Negro holds the balance of power in about 7 or 8 or 10 States of the American Union. Therefore, everything is quiet at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. Therefore, my colleagues are rather slow to take hold of the problem or to express themselves upon it. For the same reasons the press of the country does not hesitate to state that it is afraid to handle the question. It is dynamite. However, when 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 Negroes become organized and convince us that they mean business, they will be dynamite, and the dynamite will produce results with an explosion. There will be no question about it. Religiously, economically, socially, politically, racially, and in every way the thing I propose ought to be done. It must be done, it can be done, and it will be done.

I am one of those who believe that, in accordance with His plan, God Almighty sent the children of Israel down into the land of Egypt in slavery in order that they there might absorb and take on the cultural trades and arts and training and literature of the Egyptians, who at that time had the greatest civilization in the world, and that later, through Moses and Aaron, they were led out into the promised land; and it is not far-fetched to say that, in the wisdom of God Almighty himself, the Negro was brought from the wilds of the jungles of Africa in his heathen condition and planted on the American shore as a slave in order that he might learn the arts and trades and culture and music and education and religion of the American people; and, having been thus prepared, it is a further plan of the Almighty that the Negroes may be transferred back to the land of their forefathers, a land where there still remain a few of their brethren who are without Christianity, without education and training, to teach them the American way of life and to reclaim and save their less fortunate kith and kin.

Be it enacted, etc.,

TITLE I

SECTION 101. This act may be cited as the "Greater Liberia Act."

SEC. 102. It is hereby declared to be the intent of Congress that the benefits and provisions of this act shall apply to citizens of the United States who may qualify as eligible for citizenship in the Republic of Liberia and who by their physicial fitness and climatic adaptability may qualify as migrants to be permanently settled in the territory hereinafter provided for and who shall have voluntarily expressed a desire to become migrants under the provisions of this act.

TITLE II

SECTION 201. (a) The President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to enter into negotiations, through the Department of State or otherwise as he may deem appropriate, with the Governments of the Republic of France and of His Majesty the King of Great Britain, respectively, for the purchase by the United States of not to exceed 400,000 square miles of territory of either or both such countries adjoining the Republic of Liberia or capable of annexation to the said Republic of Liberia.

(b) If the President shall ascertain that such territory may be purchased from either or both such countries at a price determined by him to be reasonable, he shall have and hereby is granted all the necessary authority to consummate negotiations for the purchase of such territory.

(c) If the Governments of the Republic of France and of Great Britain shall have effected public works of value and usefulness in such territories, respectively, or shall own and operate public utilities in said territories, the same shall become the property of the United States and their fair appraisal valuation shall become part of and be added to the purchase price of such territories.

(d) The purchase price of any such territory, including the value of all public works, public buildings, public utilities of government ownership, and other public property, shall be paid by crediting the agreed purchase price against the war debts owing to the United States by the country from which such territory is purchased: Provided, That in any instances in which the United States shall agree to assume the public debt of any such territory, or the payment of any outstanding bond issues of any public utilities, the same shall be deducted from the credits accruing to such country in accordance with the provisions of this subsection.

SEC. 202. Upon the consummation of the negotiations provided in the preceding section, the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to enter into further negotiations with the Governments of the Republic of France and of Great Britain, respectively, and also with other nations owing war debts to the United States for the purchase of goods and services, including textiles, tools, implements, machinery, building materials, and other goods, in such amounts, and of such type and specifications as may be judged by the President to be best adapted to the development and organization of the territories so acquired, and as will contribute to the comfort and subsistence of the migrants to such territories. Such services may include maritime transportation of personnel and matériel from points of departure to points of discharge. Such goods and services shall be paid for in the same manner as provided in subsection (d) of the preceding paragraph for the acquisition of the lands, and such payments shall be applied annually to the annual installments of principal and interest accruing to the United States from such debtor countries, respectively.

TITLE III

SECTION 301. (a) Upon completion of such negotiations by the President and the transfer to and acquisition by the United States of such territories, the President shall immediately provide for and proceed to the military occupation and policing of such territories, which territories shall become one jurisdiction to be known and designated as the United States Territory of Greater Liberia, under a military governor and government, pending the establishment of civil government by Congress. The President shall further agree with the Governments of the Republic of France and Great Britain, respectively, for the gradual withdrawal of their respective troops and public officials and replacement by United States troops and public officials in such manner as best will preserve public peace and order during the transition. Except as hereinafter provided, and until Congress shall otherwise dispose, it shall be the duty of the military government to maintain the status quo in the newly acquired territory, and to maintain peace and order and enforce the revenue laws of such territory. The President is hereby authorized to appoint one of the ranking major generals of the Army as military governor of such territory.

(b) For the purpose of carrying out such military occupation the President is hereby authorized to call into active service two war-strength divisions of the United States Army, or such parts thereof, or such other troops, as he may deem advisable, including such units of the Regular Army and the National Guard as may physically qualify according to title I of this act and are available for duty, and proceed to the occupation of such territory under the jurisdiction of the military governor thereof.

(c) The President is further authorized to recruit, organize, and train, from such citizens of the United States as may qualify according to title I of this act, and subject to all other conditions now required for enlistment in the United States Navy, a naval militia, not to exceed, including officers and other personnel, 10,000 seamen and 5,000 marines, for coast-patrol service on the coastal lands and territorial waters of such territory; and, to detail and utilize for such service, from the list of inactive ships of the Navy, units of such type and tonnage as he may deem most suitable for such service. The said naval militia shall be commanded by a rear admiral of the Navy with appropriate staff of Navy personnel, and except as otherwise disposed by Congress, said naval militia shall be subject to the jurisdiction of, and be used for carrying out the naval needs of, the military governor of such territory.

SEC. 302. The military governor, on his departure from the United States, shall be accompanied, in addition to his regulation staff, by a special staff of civil and sanitary engineers, health officers, and other experts, assisted by such personnel as the President may deem fit and necessary, and detailed from the Army or recruited from civil life. It shall be the duty of such staff, on its arrival at such territory and under the direction of the military governor, to proceed to make a survey of the land, and particularly the unimproved hinterland, with a view to the subsequent establishment of cities, towns, and settlements, the building of roads, construction of bridges, drainage of marshlands, adoption of sanitary measures, and the gathering of all such data and information as to the nature of the land and its adaptablity to civilized habitation, including the taking of photographs, drawing of topographic maps, and other documentary guidance as will aid in the subsequent settlement and development of such territory. The said staff of engineers and experts shall submit its data and information to the military governor, who in turn shall study the same and submit the same to the President with his recommendations. The said staff of engineers, health officers, and experts shall not be discharged upon completion of its survey, but shall be retained for subsequent service in connection with the organization of said lands for civilized habitation.

SEC. 303. Upon assuming command of his post, the military governor shall at once proceed to take possession of all customs and other revenues, taking measures for the prevention of smuggling, and shall take over the management and operation of all public utilities that by this act may have come into the ownership of the United States and impound their revenues until further disposition by the President. For such purposes the President may detail an adequate number of finance officers from the Army and the Navy to accompany the forces of occupation and to be subject to the jurisdiction of the military governor.

(b) The military governor, subject to the approval of the President, may make such changes in policies and governmental procedure and directing personnel in the various agencies and establishments of government in the newly acquired territory as shall be consistent with the exercise of sovereignty by and to the best interests of the Government of the United States.

TITLE IV

SECTION 401. (a) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, the President is authorized, upon the consummation of the negotiations provided for in title II of this act, to create a Bureau of Colonization, attached to the Department of the Interior or acting as an independent agency as the President may deem best for the efficient operation of this act, and all powers of said Bureau of Colonization shall be exercised and administered by an Administrator of Colonization, hereinafter referred to and designated as the "Administrator."

(b) The Administrator may, without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation of such experts and such other officers and employees as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act; and may make such expenditures, including expenditures for personal services, rent of quarters at the seat of government and elsewhere, for law books and books of reference, for stationery, printing and binding, and other facilities incidental to the adequate and efficient operation of said bureau, as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act.

(c) The Administrator is hereby authorized to establish, man, and equip such regional branch offices of the Bureau of Colonization within the continental United States and in the newly acquired territory as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this act. The said regional branch offices in the territory shall be in charge of a Deputy Administrator appointed by the Administrator, subject to the approval of the President.

SEC. 402. (a) The President, upon receipt of the informative data provided for in section 302 of title III of this act, shall submit the same to the Administrator and shall direct the said Administrator to formulate and devise a comprehensive plan of political and economic organization of said lands in accordance with the informative data supplied, including political subdivision for purposes of local government, establishment of towns, cities, settlements, farm districts, building of roads, deforestation of jungles, construction of bridges and of dams for hydroelectric power, drainage of marshlands and irrigation of arid lands, general sanitation, erection of buildings for public purposes, establishment of rail systems and of post and telegraphic routes, dredging of harbors and navigable rivers, construction of docking facilities, provisions for territorial defense, and all such other planning and provisions as will insure to the United States the successful development of said Territory and as will safeguard the health, life, and safety of migrants to said territory.

(b) Upon approval by the President of the plan of organization provided for in the preceding subsection, and in pursuance of the agreements provided for in section 202 of title II of this act, the President shall call upon the debtor nations to supply all such tools, implements, machinery, building materials, textiles, and supplies of whatsoever nature as may be necessary to carry out the plan of organization of said lands, either by shipments from the sources of supply of the said debtor nations, or by purchases within the United States to be charged to said debtor nations. The Bureau of Colonization shall keep accounts of such supply of goods and services, submitting periodic balances to the President as he may direct, for the purpose of credit to the said debtor nations in accordance with section 202 of title II of this act.

(c) Upon approval by the President of the general plan of organization provided for in subsection (a) of this section, the President is hereby authorized to enlist, recruit, and organize three war-strength divisions of labor troops, or such number of labor troops as he may reasonably deem necessary, including skilled and unskilled labor from among such citizens of the United States between the ages of 21 years and 50 years, as may best qualify as settlers or migrants to said territory in accordance with title I of this act, for active service in their respective trades and professions in connection with the carrying out of the general plan of organization of the land, such active enlistment to be for a term of 3 years, and not more than 6 years under a re-enlistment, or until a civil government for such territory shall have assumed the responsibility of carrying out the unfinished portions of said plan of organization. In addition to their defensive equipment, the said troops shall be further equipped with the necessary tools, machinery, and implements of labor necessary to carry out such plan of organization. The rate of pay, rations, and subsistence of said labor troops shall be the same as the rate of pay in the United States Army for similar services: Provided, That the Administrator, with the approval of the President, may fix additional compensation under such terms as shall be just and reasonable to skilled labor, to compensate for losses for the same type of service in civil life.

(d) The President is hereby authorized to accept such shipping facilities as may be obtained from the debtor nations for the transportation of such troops and to credit the same to their respective installments on the war debts; or, in his discretion, he may use all or any of the transportation facilities of any department, agency, or dependency of the Government of the United States for such purpose, and may use all the methods, plans, and facilities of the United States Army for the transportation, maintenance, and discipline of said troops from the point of enlistment within the United States to the point of expected service in the newly acquired territory.

SEC. 403. (a) Upon the arrival of the labor divisions provided for in the preceding subsections, and subject to the orders and instructions of the Administrator, the Deputy Administrator resident in the newly acquired territory (hereinafter designated as the resident deputy administrator), aided by the staff of experts and engineers provided for in section 302 of title III of this act, shall proceed to execute and carry out the plan of organization of the lands, and he shall be responsible to the President and to the Administrator for its prompt and proper execution. The said Resident Deputy Administrator shall be provided with adequate facilities for the transportation of men and materials, and for communication within the said territory and with the pertinent agencies within the United States to better carry out his duties.

(b) Except for the performance of labor and other duties incidental to the execution of the plan of organization, the said labor troops shall be subject to the jurisdiction of the military governor, who, at the same time, shall render to the Resident Deputy Administrator all the cooperation and assistance necessary to aid in carrying out the plan of organization.

SEC. 404. When the military governor shall deem it advisable, and subject to his recommendations, the Administrator may provide for and proceed to the transportation to the said territory of the families and dependents of any member of the territorial forces of land or sea, or of the labor divisions, rendering services in the newly acquired territory, in the same manner as provided for subsequent migrants in the succeeding provisions of this act. Such individuals as shall have volunteered to serve in said armed forces or labor divisions, and their families, shall be allowed a 25-percent increase over and above the maximum allowed to any other migrant by way of grant-in-aid as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 405. Upon completion of the term of enlistment of any such member of the armed forces or the labor divisions, and his discharge from the service, it shall be the duty of the Resident Deputy Administrator or his successor in duties, to provide the said discharged individual with land, housing, household goods, tools, and other implements of labor, subsistence, transportation for himself and dependents to the point of settlement, and all other facilities for his reentry into civil life, including his increase in grant-in-aid, in the same manner as hereinafter provided for subsequent migrants to said territory. In addition thereto, any such individual shall enjoy preferential rating for any classified or unclassified civil-service position in the government of the said territory for which he may otherwise qualify.

SEC. 406. The President is hereby authorized, from any funds available in the United States Treasury and not allocated for any other purpose, to provide in accordance with Army standards, for pensioning or paying of compensation to any individual serving in the land or sea forces provided for in title III, or in the labor troops provided for in title IV, or his dependents, in case of death or disability while in such service; or, the President may, in his discretion, enter into contracts or covenants with life-insurance companies to provide such compensation in case of the death or disability of any officer or enlisted man engaged in such service, in the same or similar manner as provided for war-risk insurance, and the President is hereby authorized to utilize any available funds of the United States not allocated for any other purpose, for the purpose of payment of premiums for the same. Each individual shall be so insured, or pension and compensation so provided for, on his enlistment or assignment for duty in the newly acquired territory.

SEC. 407. (a) After the establishment of the Bureau of Colonization provided for in this title, any citizen of the United States, between the ages of 21 years and 50 years of age, in good physical condition, who can qualify in accordance with the provisions of title I, and who is capable by reason of his training, intelligence, and ambition of becoming self-sustaining as a settler in the United States Territory of Greater Liberia, and who desires to become a migrant and settler to said territory under the provisions of this act, and any acceptable alien who is a bona fide resident of the United States who can qualify according to the provisions of this section and under such other terms and conditions as the Administrator may prescribe with respect to such aliens, shall file an application on blanks prepared and supplied by the Bureau of Colonization, with the mayor or with the chief of police of the city, town, or village in which he resides, or with the county clerk or corresponding officer of the county in which he resides, giving such data and information as will aid the Bureau of Colonization in making the proper arrangements for his migration and placement in the said territory. If such blanks are not available in his city, town, village, or county, the applicant may request the same from the Bureau of Colonization, or from the nearest regional office of the said Bureau.

(b) If the applicant is a householder, he may make application for all the members of his household as a unit, and in such a case the limitations as to age and other conditions established in the preceding section shall not apply to the members of his household. The application of a person responsible for the support and maintenance of children under the age of 12 years shall not be favorably acted upon, unless such children are to accompany such applicant on his migration, or unless he has made adequate provisions for their support and maintenance pending their transfer to join the applicant in the new territory.

(c) The following persons shall not be eligible to apply for migration: Escaped convicts or fugitives from justice, unless the jurisdiction in which they are desired waives extradition or prosecution; persons under indictment and awaiting trial, unless the jurisdiction in which such trial is pending waives prosecution; persons applying for migration for the purpose of defrauding creditors, unless written release from such creditors is filed with the Bureau of Colonization; and such other persons as the Administrator may reasonably believe likely to become public charges or social liabilities in the territory. The rulings and opinions of the Administrator may be reviewed by certiorari to any United States district court of competent jurisdiction.

(d) The various mayors, chiefs of police, county clerks, or other persons in authority with whom such applications are filed, shall forward the same forthwith to the Bureau of Colonization, and the Administrator shall receive and pass upon the same, and shall classify and catalogue the same for action in accordance with the provisions of this act; but the Administrator shall not order the transfer of any applicant or his household, unless proper and adequate placement has been obtained in the territory for the said migrant. The Resident Deputy Administrator in the territory shall keep the Bureau of Colonization promptly and fully informed as to possible and available placements, such placements to be based on occupational opportunities for economic self-sustenance either independently or in private employment or as a public servant in the Federal or Territorial services.

SEC. 408. Subject to the authority of the President, the Administrator shall have power:

(a) To requisition the debtor countries for goods and services in accordance with the agreements entered into between the President and the debtor governments, respectively, under the provisions of title II of this act, and to receive and receipt for the same in the name of the President.

(b) To order goods and services in the name of the President from private individuals or concerns in the ordinary course of trade, and charge the same to such appropriations as Congress may from time to time make for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

(c) To requisition any department, board, or agency of the Government of the United States for any available goods, services, or facilities which may be used and useful in the carrying out of the provisions of this act, without affecting the proper operation of such department, board, or agency.

(d) To provide transportation by land and by sea to qualifying applicants migrating under the provisions of this act, and to their households, from the initial point of departure in the United States to the point of settlement in the Territory of Greater Liberia; and to contract with land and maritime transportation companies for such purposes to the extent that may be necessary by reason of the fact that such transportation facilities are not available from the debtor nations or from the Government of the United States.

(e) To provide adequate subsistence, medical care, and other necessities of life for the migrants during transit and until finally settled at the point of settlement; and, to pay in whole or in part for such transportation and necessities as are provided under this section, in accordance with the circumstances and economic needs of each migrant.

(f) To make loans to individuals, partnerships, or corporations composed of migrants, in meritorious cases, not to exceed the sum of $1,000 in any case, on reasonably liberal terms and conditions, as initial capital for business and industrial enterprises in said territory.

(g) To extend such grants-in-aid, in cash or in supplies and equipment, to such migrants as he may deem advisable, to enable them to establish themselves on a self-sustaining basis at the chosen point of settlement, subject to the following limitations in any case: For clothing and household equipment, not to exceed $300; for machinery, tools, implements, and materials of labor, not to exceed $300; for food and physical subsistence, not to exceed $1 per day for each person 12 years of age or over, and 50 cents a day for each child under 12 years of age; for educational and recreational facilities, not to exceed $50 for each person in any one year. Such grants-in-aid shall not extend, under ordinary circumstances, for more than 1 year after the migrant and his household shall have settled in their new location, or, under extraordinary circumstances, for more than 2 years. At any time, when in the judgment of the Resident Deputy Administrator a migrant shall have become self-sustaining, such grants-in-aid, except unexpired State grants-in-aid, shall cease. The Administrator shall have authority to act as trustee for the administration of State grants-in-aid on behalf of the migrants, accounting periodically to the various States therefor. The Resident Deputy Administrator shall provide medical aid, medicines, and hospitalization for the migrants during the period of economic adjustment, free of charge, and shall take such other and further measures as may be reasonably necessary to safeguard and protect the health of the migrants. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this subsection, the Resident Deputy Administrator is hereby authorized to establish and operate general stores, commissaries, depots, pharmacies, hospitals, infirmaries, and other buildings and facilities in accordance with the needs of every locality or new settlement occupied by the migrants.

(h) In the event that the governments of the various States should extend grants-in-aid to their respective citizens who may become migrants under the provisions of this act, then the grants-in-aid provided for in the preceding subsection shall operate as supplementary grants up to the amounts established by said subsection: Provided, That when the State grants-in-aid shall exceed the limits established by such subsection the migrant shall have the full benefit of such excess: Provided further, That State grants-in-aid shall not be diminished or curtailed by reason of the cessation of the grants-in-aid under such subsection.

SEC. 409. The Resident Deputy Administrator shall be assisted in the administration of the territory and of this act by a board of commissioners appointed by the Administrator, with the approval of the President, whose duties respectively shall be as follows:

(a) A commissioner of interior, who shall be the custodian of all forests, flora, and fauna of the territory, and of all lands not parceled out for public or private use. He shall establish and maintain a land office, with branch offices in various localities, for the registration of all land titles or interests in property, and shall act as register of deeds for the military government; he shall have charge of the welfare of the uncivilized natives and shall administer the laws of the tribes, and shall supervise their education and progress so as to prepare and adjust them as quickly as possible to the new system of life.

(b) A commissioner of education, who shall establish and maintain a public-school system for the territory according to the American system and standards of education, coordinating any existent school systems in the territory with the new order, and shall also establish and maintain such schools as he may determine to be necessary for the training of military and naval officers. He shall act as commissioner of education for the military government, and as such he shall have supervision of all educational activities within the territory subject to the military government, making such changes as will obtain an integrated and uniform system of education for the Territory.

(c) A commissioner of public health and sanitation, who shall have full authority in all matters of public health and sanitation, including athletic activities and physical development and education in the public schools. The commissioner of public health and sanitation, together with the commissioner of interior, shall adopt measures for the improvement of the health and sanitation of the uncivilized tribes and their physical welfare. The commissioner of public health and sanitation shall have full authority over all hospitals of the territorial government and supervisory authority over all other hospitals, public or private. He shall act as commissioner of public health and sanitation for the military government, and as such shall enforce all orders and decrees of the military government relating to public health and sanitation.

(d) A commissioner of agriculture, commerce, and industry who shall have full charge of the economic organization and development of the territory. He shall be charged with the economic adjustment and education of the migrants in the preparation and cultivation of the land for commercial productivity; foster and develop industries from the products of the soil; and open, organize, and develop markets at home and abroad for the products of the territory. The commissioner of agriculture, commerce, and industry shall have authority to employ specialists and experts in the various branches of his activities. He shall act as commissioner of agriculture, commerce, and industry for the military government, and in this capacity he shall supervise on behalf of the military government all activities of the territory in his respective fields, including the enforcement of plant and animal quarantine, enforcement of the laws, orders, or decrees on weights and measures, and all commerce regulations and labor laws or regulations.

(e) A commissioner of public works who shall take over, maintain, and operate all public works completed by the staff of experts provided for in section 302 of this act, upon their completion, and who shall have charge of the construction of all public buildings, sewage and water-supply systems, and all enterprises of a public-works nature in the areas selected for city, town, or village sites, after such sites have been cleared and prepared by the staff of experts and labor divisions hereinbefore provided, and also shall construct all building facilities, such as schools and other public houses, and incidental side roads, in the organized rural areas or farm districts. He shall act as commissioner of public works for the military government, and as such he shall be the custodian of all public buildings, and shall be charged with the care and maintenance of such buildings and of water-supply and sewage systems in the organized portions of the territory; and shall carry out all orders of the military government within the scope of his office.

(f) A commissioner of banking and finance, who shall be in charge of the monetary needs of the migrants, and shall organize a banking and currency system for the territory, and shall be the custodian of all funds of the Bureau of Colonization to be expended within the territory or by the Resident Deputy Administrator. He shall act as treasurer for the military government, and subject to the authority of the military governor and with the aid of officers detailed by the latter for the purpose he shall have charge of the collection of all taxes and revenues for the military government, and shall be the custodian of the same. The commissioner of banking and finance shall maintain an accounting office, in charge of an auditor or certified accountant, to keep all accounts and records of the Resident Deputy Administrator, of the military government, and of the migrants with reference to their grants-in-aid. The accounting office may maintain branches in the various organized settlements.

(g) A legal adviser, who shall act as such for the Resident Deputy Administrator, and in the capacity of attorney general for the military government. He shall further be charged with the gathering and coordination of all existing laws, recommending to the military governor the nullification of those that are inoperative or inconsistent with the policies of the Government of the United States or with the sovereignty of the United States, recommending changes, and codifying the law of the land.

(h) The Resident Deputy Administrator shall have authority to appoint an executive secretary, who shall have charge of all records and archives of the office of the Resident Deputy Administrator, and of his seal. He shall act as secretary of state for the military government with such power and authority under the military governor as is consistent with and pertinent to the nature of his office.

(i) The board of commissioners, of which the legal adviser and the executive secretary shall be members, shall, together with the Resident Deputy Administrator (who shall be chairman thereof), prepare the territory at the earliest possible time for civil government, by organizing their respective departments into working units and adopting jointly such measures as shall be deemed necessary to obtain that end. The salaries of the members of the board of commissioners shall be fixed by the Administrator, subject to the approval of the President.

TITLE V

SECTION 501. (a) All proprietary rights in any and all lands acquired under the provisions of this act, except (1) lands used or reserved for governmental or other public uses, (2) lands set aside as tribal reservations for uncivilized natives, or as forest or mining reserves, by the commissioner of interior, and (3) lands previously acquired by good and sufficient private title or subject to previously acquired proprietary rights shall be conveyed by the President by quitclaim deed to a corporation, to be known as the Greater Liberia Corporation, and to be organized by the Administrator under the direction of the President, for the economic organization and development of the new territory.

(b) The said corporation shall parcel out all available lands, except such lands as shall be reserved for public utilities and for its own administrative uses, into farms to be sold to the migrants who might settle in the rural areas, and into subdivisions and lots to be sold to migrants who might settle in the villages, towns, or cities: Provided, That migrants receiving grants-in-aid shall not be allowed more than 50 acres of farm land nor more than 50-foot frontage of land subdivided as urban lots.

(c) The said corporation, either directly or through a subsidiary land company or companies, shall proceed to construct farm homes, city dwellings, business buildings, and other structures for private use on said lands, and shall sell such farms and dwellings to the migrants at cost, including expenses of administration and interest on bonds issued or preferred stock, either for cash or with a partial or no down payment, and with not more than 30 years to make full payment. All homes sold to persons migrating under the provisions of this act, or the plans for such homes, shall be approved first by the commissioner of sanitation as to sanitary facilities, and by the resident deputy administrator before such sale is made.

(d) The Greater Liberia Corporation shall have the exclusive right to operate all of the public utilities for the benefit of the government and the people of the territory; and the President shall release and quitclaim to the said corporation all proprietary rights that may have accrued to the United States, by virtue of the negotiations provided in title II of this act, in any railway line or lines (including all rolling stock and real estate involved), in any telephone, telegraph, or radio systems, in any hydroelectric establishment or electric light and power system, and in any other public utility or utilities. The Greater Liberia Corporation shall proceed, either directly or by means of separate subsidiaries, to organize and extend the said public utilities into comprehensive and integrated systems, to the end that the entire territory shall be adequately served thereby: Provided, That, subject to the approval of the President, and under such safeguards as will best protect the interests of the United States, the Greater Liberia Corporation may assign to any private corporation, foreign or domestic, for a reasonable period of time its rights to an exclusive franchise to operate any of such public utilities when such operation may prove advisable: Provided further, That the migrants under the provisions of this act shall have preference under all circumstances for employment for any position in such public utilities for which they may otherwise qualify.

(e) The President and the commissioner of interior shall quitclaim to the Greater Liberia Corporation all mines and mining rights, and the said corporation shall have the exclusive right to exploit the underground natural resources of the territory for the benefit of the people and the government of the said territory; and, the said corporation may proceed, either directly or through separate subsidiaries, to open and operate mines and utilize the mineral resources of the land to the profit of the people and Government of Greater Liberia: Provided, That the said corporation, under the same restrictions and conditions as are established in the preceding subsection for public utilities, may assign mining concessions to private corporations, foreign or domestic.

SEC. 502. (a) The Greater Liberia Corporation is authorized to issue two classes of stock, to wit, a common stock and a nonvoting preferred stock with guaranteed dividends. The common stock shall not have a par value of more than $10 a share; not more than 49 percent of the same shall ever be offered for sale to the public; and the sale of the said stock shall be limited to nonalien residents of the Territory of Greater Liberia. The provisions of this section shall apply to the stock of the Greater Liberia Corporation itself and to the stock of any of its subsidiaries.

(b) Subject to the approval of the President, the Greater Liberia Corporation is authorized to issue bonds, either in its own name or in the corporate name of any of its subsidiaries, for the purpose of carrying on its various branches of business or enlarging the same, and the President is hereby authorized to pledge the full faith and credit of the United States to guarantee the redemption of said bonds, and in pursuance thereof, is hereby directed to establish sinking funds to secure the adequate redemption of each class of bonds issued under the provisions of this subsection: Provided, That interest on the said bonds, annual allocations to the sinking fund, and guaranteed dividends on the nonvoting preferred stock shall constitute prior claims after payment of operating expenses.

SEC. 503. The Greater Liberia Corporation, either in its own name or through a subsidiary or subsidiaries, is hereby authorized, subject to the authority of the commissioner of banking and finance, to engage in the business of banking and foreign exchange, and to organize a banking system for the territory, and provide bank-credit facilities to the migrants for the purpose of economic development under such liberal terms and conditions as will best carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 504. The President is hereby authorized to allocate and assign to the government of the new territory the sum of $10,000,000, from any sums available and not allocated to other purposes, such sum to apply to the purchase of 51 percent of the common stock of the Greater Liberia Corporation, and to provide initial capital for the operation of the same, and to advance such additional sums as in his judgment and on the recommendation of the Administrator may be deemed necessary to put this title into effective operation: Provided, That such sum or sums shall constitute loans to the government of said territory, to be repaid in not less than 25 years, with interest at the rate of 2 percent per annum.

TITLE VI

SECTION 601. (a) The President is authorized to enter into negotiations with the Government of the Republic of Liberia and the American Colonization Society for the purpose of obtaining, on behalf of the United States and from the said Government of Liberia and Colonization Society, a land grant of not to exceed 5,000,000 acres of land capable of being used or converted for agricultural, industrial, and commercial purposes, and of being organized into communities, settlements, and residential and farm districts. Should the President determine that such negotiations may be consummated in a manner satisfactory to him, he shall have all the necessary authority to consummate such negotiations and to accept deeds or other evidence of title in said lands on behalf of the United States.

(b) Upon their acquisition by the United States, the said lands shall, for colonization purposes, be put under the authority of the Resident Deputy Administrator, who, either in person or through a resident agent appointed by him for that purpose, shall have full supervision over the same for such purposes, and the Resident Deputy Administrator or his resident agent in Liberia shall act as personal representative of the President of the United States in all further negotiations with the Government of the Republic of Liberia in reference to said lands, except as the President may otherwise dispose.

(c) The President shall convey by quitclaim deeds to the Greater Liberia Corporation, provided for in title V, all lands acquired under the provisions of this title, except such lands as shall be reserved by the Resident Deputy Administrator for public roads, public buildings, and other public purposes, said lands to be parceled out and disposed of in the same manner provided by section 501 for lands acquired by the said corporation in the Territory of Greater Liberia. The Greater Liberia Corporation is hereby authorized to enter into negotiations and contracts or agreements, subject to the approval of the President, with the Government of the Republic of Liberia and the American Colonization Society, for the extension into the said Republic of Liberia of its activities provided for in subsections (d) and (e) of section 501, and to exercise the right of eminent domain in the establishment of rights-of-way for trunk-line railways, and telephone and telegraph lines, to unify the Greater Liberia systems and to provide the settlements and communities established under this title with the benefits and services of such public utilities.

SEC. 602. (a) Upon the consummation of the negotiations for the acquisition of lands provided for in section 601, the President is authorized to enter into further negotiations with the Government of the Republic of Liberia for the purpose of obtaining the consent of such Government to the construction by the United States, in areas of such republic where persons receiving the benefits of this title may settle, of public roads, bridges, schools, sanitary facilities, river and harbor improvements, flood-control works, and other public buildings and works of similar character, such buildings and works to be constructed by the United States, and such part of the cost of such construction as may be agreed upon by the President and the Government of the Republic of Liberia to be covered by bonds of the Republic of Liberia issued to the United States and bearing such interest and containing such provisions with respect to redemption as the President may deem adequate: Provided, That the title to such public works and buildings shall remain in the Government of the United States until such time as the Government of the Republic of Liberia shall have amortized with interest the bonds provided for herein or such part thereof as shall be agreed to between the President and the Government of the Republic of Liberia, at which time the President shall convey to the Government of the Republic of Liberia the title to said public buildings and works, reserving a lien on the same to secure any unpaid balances remaining. If the President determines that such negotiations may be consummated in a manner satisfactory to him, and if he further determines that the Government of the Republic of Liberia will give adequate assurances with respect to the operation and maintenance of such public buildings and works as may be constructed in such republic by the United States, the President shall have all the necessary authority to consummate such negotiations.

(b) In the event the consent of the Government of the Republic of Liberia to the construction of such public buildings and works is obtained as provided in subsection (a) of this section, the Administrator is authorized, subject to the approval of the President, to construct any such public buildings and works in such areas of the Republic of Liberia where persons receiving the benefits of this title may have settled, as he deems advisable: Provided, That preference in employment for such construction of public works and buildings shall be given to citizens of the United States who can qualify as migrants under the provisions of this act: Provided further, That no such public buildings or works shall be constructed until the Government of the Republic of Liberia has agreed that upon completion of such public buildings or works, the Government of said Republic will deliver to the President of the United States, or any other person designated by him for the purpose, bonds of such Republic covering such part of the cost of such public buildings or works as is to be borne by such Republic.

SEC. 603. (a) Any citizen of the United States, or any alien who is a bona fide resident of the United States, who can qualify in accordance with the provisions of title I and subsection (a) of section 407 of this act, and who may also become eligible for citizenship in the Republic of Liberia, may apply for migration to the Republic of Liberia under the provisions of this title in the same manner and under the same terms and conditions as are prescribed for migrants to the Territory of Greater Liberia in accordance with the provisions of section 407 of this act.

(b) The Administrator shall proceed, in the case of migrants to the Republic of Liberia under the provisions of this title, in the same manner and under the same terms and conditions as are provided in sections 407 and 408 of this act for migrants to the Territory of Greater Liberia, and shall extend to said migrants under this title such of the facilities, grants-in-aid, and all other emoluments extended to migrants to the Territory of Greater Liberia under any of the provisions of this act as are not inapplicable to such migrations to the Republic of Liberia.

SEC. 604. The President shall further negotiate with the Government of the Republic of Liberia to secure reasonable guaranties of safety of life and limb and freedom of action for the migrants while under Liberian rule; to assure that the Government of the Republic of Liberia will earnestly prohibit and punish any act or acts of intolerance or persecution, either political, social, or economic, of the migrants because of their condition as migrants; to assure that the migrants while aliens in the Republic of Liberia shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities of any other aliens resident in the Republic of Liberia, and that, after naturalization, they shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities of any other naturalized citizens of the Republic of Liberia; and to assure that the Government of the Republic of Liberia will extend the greatest amount of home rule consistent with the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Liberia to all settlements and communities made up of migrants under the provisions of this act; and that preference to all appointive offices in said settlements or communities shall be given to naturalized migrants who may otherwise qualify. The provisions of this section shall be a condition precedent to other negotiations under this title.

TITLE VII

SECTION 701. (a) Upon assumption of jurisdiction and exercise of sovereignty by the United States over the territory of greater Liberia, the President shall extend to such territory all the Federal services in their various activities and departments, except such as shall by circumstances and local conditions be inoperative; and all Federal laws and statutes not locally inapplicable shall extend to the said territory with the same force and effectiveness as in any other lands subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

(b) For the purposes of this section the President shall appoint one special assistant to the Postmaster General, who shall have charge of the organization and operation of the postal services in the territory and of the enforcement of the postal laws, and who shall be responsible to the Postmaster General of the United States for the proper functioning of the postal system throughout the territory; one special assistant to the Attorney General, who shall be in charge of the enforcement of the Federal laws throughout the territory and of the proper functioning of the judicial department, performing such other and further duties in connection with his office as shall be assigned by the Attorney General of the United States; one special assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall have charge of the collection of all customs and internal revenues in the name of the United States, and who shall act as the personal representative of the Secretary of the Treasury in all matters coming within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Treasury; one special assistant to the Secretary of Commerce, who shall organize, supervise, and direct the lighthouse, coast and geodetic survey, steamboat inspection, and census services and all other services and functions pertaining to the Department of Commerce, and who shall act as the personal representative of the Secretary of Commerce in all matters pertaining to his Department; one special assistant to the Secretary of Labor, who shall supervise and direct the immigration and naturalization services and all other services within the scope and jurisdiction of the Department of Labor; and in the same manner the President shall appoint special assistants to the Secretaries of Agriculture and of the Interior if in his judgment he deems that the services and the needs of the territory so require. The military governor, in addition to his duties as such, shall act as personal representative of the Secretary of War, and shall be charged with the organization of the military defenses of the territory, and of the training and supervision of all military forces and activities throughout the territory; and in the same manner the rear admiral in command of the naval militia of the territory shall act as the personal representative of the Secretary of the Navy and shall be charged with the organization and supervision of the naval defenses of the Territory and of the training of all personnel in the science of naval warfare. The President shall further divide the territory into Federal judicial districts, and he is hereby authorized to establish and put into operation a United States district court in each judicial district, with the same powers and under the same terms and conditions as in the case of such courts established for other Territories of the United States.

(c) All appointments to office, whether Federal or Territorial office, shall preferably be made from such citizens of the United States who, by their physical fitness and climatic adaptability, may assure to the United States the proper operation of the governmental services, and are less likely to impair such services for failure of physical endurance, all other conditions being equal.

SEC. 702. At the earliest practicable time, but not more than 2 years from the military occupation of said lands, Congress shall establish a civil government in the said territory, and shall enact and put into operation and in force an organic act for the said territory, providing therein the maximum amount of self-government which is consistent with the territorial form of government. It is hereby declared to be the intent of Congress that the territorial form of government herein provided for shall be only transitory and preparatory to a higher form of self-government, and that Congress shall provide for a commonwealth form of government to follow the said territorial form of government at the end of 4 years from the initiation of the said territorial form of government, such commonwealth to be established under such terms and conditions as will provide complete autonomy to the said territory. It shall be the policy of the territorial government to prepare the said territory for government as such a commonwealth under the United States.

(b) Whenever, at any time after the establishment of the commonwealth government, in the opinion of Congress the said commonwealth shall have attained sufficient perfection in its internal life to warrant independence, and its national defenses shall have been so organized and perfected as reasonably to assure to the said commonwealth security against foreign aggression, the President at the request of Congress may enter into negotiations with the Government of the Republic of Liberia with a view to having such commonwealth incorporated into the Republic of Liberia to form together one independent Republic of Greater Liberia, with due recognition as such by the United States. If the President determines that such negotiations may not be consummated with the Government of the Republic of Liberia in a manner satisfactory to him and in accordance with the purposes and intent of this act, he shall formulate and submit to Congress for its approval a plan whereby independence may be granted to the Commonwealth of Greater Liberia without incorporation into the Republic of Liberia.

SEC. 703. Until Congress shall have been able to estimate and determine the annual cost of the operation of this act and the available income for the same, the President is hereby authorized to utilize the following funds and credits to put this act into immediate operation and to finance the initial expenditures in connection with this act:

(a) All customs, Federal internal revenues and other Federal taxes levied and collected within the territory of greater Liberia.

(b) All payments in gold or in cash paid by the debtor nations to the United States by virtue of World War debts, whether the same is a so-called token payment or any other form of cash payment.

(c) Not to exceed $1,000,000,000 of any funds of the United States available and not allocated for any other purposes: Provided, That if such funds be not available, the President is hereby authorized to pledge the credit of the United States in an amount not to exceed the said $1,000,000,000 in order to secure such funds.

SEC. 704. The President is authorized to remove any restrictions placed on the borrowing power or borrowing facilities of any nation owing debts to the United States, by any act of Congress limiting the borrowing powers or facilities of such debtor nations, in consequence of concessions obtained by the United States by virtue of the negotiations and agreements entered into pursuant to the provisions of title II of this act, the extent of the removal of such restrictions in any case to be determined on the basis of the concessions made in relation to the total debts due from said debtor nations, respectively. The President is further authorized to reimpose such restriction at any time upon failure to fully carry out any of the agreements entered into or concessions obtained by virtue of title II of this act.

SEC. 705. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provisons to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

EXHIBIT A

DOES HITLER WANT AMERICA NEXT? HERE IS THE EVIDENCE—AND THE INSIDE STORY OF WHAT WE ARE DOING ABOUT IT

(By Walter Karig)

Hitler wants American soil.

He almost got it—a chunk out of the northeastern edge of South America—when President Roosevelt was tipped off that the map makers of Munich were contemplating real-estate transactions on this side of the Atlantic.

That was when the world started to hear about "continental defense" from Washington, and inspired stories went forth to Europe that the United States was contemplating a New World League of Nations embracing Canada, Latin America, and even Australia and New Zealand.

Quickly the British sent back word that they had never, never intended giving Guiana to Germany. No, indeed! They had merely discussed Guiana with Hitler as a haven for the exiled German Jews. Immediately there broke out in the servile German press bitter denunciations of the United States as the oppressor of Latin America. Powerful short-wave radio stations in Germany and Italy swamped South American reception with propaganda that the Roosevelt preparedness program was designed to intimidate and conquer South America. Our southern neighbors were asked to remember the occupation of Nicaragua, the "theft" of Panama from Colombia by "that other Roosevelt."

So this message went forth by trans-Atlantic telephone to American Ambassadors Kennedy in England, Bullitt in France: "The United States Government is going to stop Hitler, regardless of Great Britain and France."

Uncle Sam is tired of being Uncle Samaritan. When we tried to stop the Japanese from starting to gobble up China, our sister democracies, England and France, gave us no support. The United States realizes now, after the "Peace of Munich," that Britain and France do not care whither nazi-facism goes, so long as it goes away from them.

The United States can play at that game, and has shaped a course as determined and as carefully planned as any venture we have made in international affairs.

First, we are uniting the North, Central, and South American commonwealths to resist European political invasion.

By virture of our ownership of half the world's gold, we are going to resist European commercial exploitation of our neighbor countries by extending credits. Not to South American buyers; we learned our lesson in the 1920's there. The credits go to American exporters, to develop Latin-American markets.

Simultaneously, by making a trade treaty with Turkey, the United States has stopped the Berlin-to-Bagdad parade of the Nazis, thrown a monkey wrench into Hitler's consolidation of southeastern Europe, and robbed the Fuehrer's victory over Chamberlain and Daladier of at least a third of its potential value.

In answer to the Anglo-French plea that "we democracies must stick together," the United States has replied: "Stick with me if you know what's good for you, but I'm going ahead, regardless." France and Great Britain need the United States and the friendship of American neighbors. An all-American union to resist Hitlerism has been created to offset London's European league to buy off the dictators—with others' wealth.

That has been followed up by intimations to the British and the French, and to the Belgians, the Dutch, and the Portuguese, that any cession of colonies to Nazi Germany in the Pacific or on the West Coast of Africa would be considered an act unfriendly to the United States.

Why? Gracious goodness, with tiny Portugal and Belgium land-poor with African territory, why do we begrudge Germany some? Britain and France grabbed the best of Germany's former colonies in Africa; why shouldn't some of them, at least, be returned?

And all those islands in the Pacific Ocean. Good for nothing but coconuts. Who cares if the Germans get them back? Who has them now, anyhow?

Perfectly natural questions. Intelligent, too.

But—the Army says "No."

The Navy says "No."

The Commerce Department says "No."

The State Department says "No."

It isn't the new dealers saying "No." It is not only President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull who are determining this policy. It is the nonpolitical technical experts, the men who have made a life's career in the Government service without worrying if a Republican or a Democrat sits in the front office. They are the ones who are telling Roosevelt and his Cabinet, as they will tell the next President, why Germany's demand for colonies is directed against the United States.

Germany could deny that with perfect truth. She wants colonies restored to her in West Africa and the Southern Pacific as jumping-off places for South America.

Great Britain and France did not object when General Franco turned over deep-water harbors in the Canary Islands to Hitler for submarine bases. The Canary Islands are in the Atlantic Ocean, just off that part of Africa which bulges toward the Americas. The United States is putting up a vigorous protest, but because it has not recognized Franco's Fascist regime in Spain, there is no place to lodge the complaint.

The reason why the United States objects to German outposts in the Atlantic, either on the Canary Islands or points south on the African mainland, is that from such points all ocean traffic between the eastern ports of North and South America can be handled as easily as a crossroads policeman controls automobile traffic.

Submarines and bombing planes based on or off the West Coast of Africa could drive mercantile shipping from the South Atlantic. If the United States is cut off from South America, it means we are cut off from our sources of tin, rubber, chromium, manganese, and the vegetable product from which gas-mask filters are made. Without access to these South American products, the United States could not survive a 6-month war. So say the members of the Army-Navy Munitions Board.

If Germany obtains insular possessions in the South Pacific, then the west coast of the Americas will be likewise threatened.

Here is heard another question: Why do our military and naval and commercial experts think Germany is going to try to cut us off from South America?

They say they don't think so; they know it.

Let us informally interview the Navy first.

Our whole theory of naval defense has been based on the assumption of a war in the Pacific. The Navy's job is to defend the Hawaiian Islands, of course, and Alaska, but our weakest point is the Panama Canal. Naval strategists have worked out the defensive maneuver known as the Pacific triangle at huge cost of time and money. The physical structure of our Navy is based on that triangular field of operations against an enemy diplomatically left unnamed—but you can bet it is not Siam. Let us, between ourselves, unofficially, say it is Japan.

Germany is Japan's ally. Those two countries and Italy have a compact of military, naval, industrial, and economic assistance.

If we should have war with Japan, Germany would come to her ally's aid. If Germany has possessions in the South Atlantic or the South Pacific, or both, the entire conception of national defense must be altered. All our plans will have to be scrapped, our Navy's make-up changed, our officers sent to school all over again, and our naval schoolmasters will have to teach each other new tricks. Even if that war should never come, the necessary preparations or precautions will cost us hundreds of millions of dollars extra with Germany in the picture; and if the war did come, the problem of national defense would be endlessly complicated, of course, with German submarine and airplane bases on our flanks, harassing our shipping, threatening our coastal cities, cutting us off from vital sources of supply.

The Navy testimony adds up to this argument against German colonies: Immediate and great expense, and perpetual danger for the United States.

The Army echoes the Navy in all details. It has a few additions to make. There is already evidence that the German Nazis are making headway in Mexico. Hitler is buying up all the petroleum Mexico confiscated from American and British operators. A strong Nazi party in Mexico would mean more revolutions in that boisterous land, and once Central American revolutions are financed in Europe and are fought to advance European political theories on this side of the water, then will come the day when the United States will need a standing army of half a million men—and standing on its borders at that.

Incidentally, nobody in the governmental structure of the United States is kidding himself about any union of American "democracies." That is just the slogan for the Pan American campaign. In the 20 Republics in the Western Hemisphere there are not 6 democracies in fact. The Nazi-Fascist pattern of government was followed in the Americas before Hitler even learned the wallpapering business. It is the pattern today in Cuba, in Haiti, in the Dominican Republic, in two-thirds of the South American republics, and it does not enrage or annoy anybody in the United States. Our Government doesn't care what sort of home-made fascism the Spanish Americans adopt, so long as they do not import their politics from Germany, Italy, or Spain.

You have heard why the armed forces of the United States object to providing Hitlerism with stepping stones toward our half of the world. The Departments of State and Commerce have their own reasons.

The State Department's apprehension is frankly based on the facts just stated. South and Central Americans just naturally run to dictatorships. Once the European dictators start organizing that hemisphere, it is good night, United States and Canada. So the State Department acts. Britain and France are warned that they cannot buy their security at American expense, as they did with Czechoslovakia. If Germany wants African lands, let generous Britain turn over some East African real estate. You can bet Germany wouldn't accept it.

The trade treaty that Secretary Hull completed with Great Britain and Canada was in itself a thrust at Hitlerism, because it made us partners in the South American trade. Hull, however, believes in the theory of a good defense being a vigorous attack, so a reciprocal-tariff treaty is being rushed through with Turkey to give the Germans something to worry about as they contemplate Berlin-to-Baghdad expansion. A trade treaty with Turkey would mean that the Turks and all Asia Minor could buy American goods cheaper than German and would be paid cash for their increased exports to the United States, whereas Germany pays only in barter.

As the Army seconds the Navy, so does the Commerce Department confirm the State Department, with some supplementary testimony.

The Commerce Department thinks the day of air-borne freight is not far distant. It does not want to see Germany established on the South Atlantic with airports ostensibly for the South American mail and parcel express service, but affording pilots training in carrying over tons of liquid-air bombs. The Commerce Department also suspects that Germany would establish free ports in its South Atlantic bases, where goods would be transshipped without customs duties, and that much legitimate South American trade would go where the commerce with China went after the Japanese established their free ports on the Shantung Peninsula and smugglers displaced legitimate shippers.

Any way the experts look at it, German colonies are going to cost the United States millions—perhaps billions—and limitless worry, annoyance, and fear.

No other nation has such sound and reasonable objections to denying Germany the return of some of her old belongings. It is America's defenses, America's commerce, America's Government that Germany's expansion threatens. To be exact, it is the expansion in our direction of nazi-ism that arouses us, a nazi-ism in open cahoots with Japan's militarists.

Hitler's eye is on South America, the storehouse of all the world's riches. His voice is already heard there. A million Nazis in Brazil alone echo him. If only Hitler could have got British or French Guiana last fall, he would be well on his way by now toward establishing a real Nazi empire, with Brazilians heiling him as Abyssinians wisely shout for Il Duce nowadays.

But give the Nazis a toehold in West Africa or Polynesia, from which they can jump when ready, and they will plant the swastika in the Western Hemisphere yet. They say so. They announce it with all the calm acceptance of planned perfection. It is destiny, they say.

Uncle Sam, believing that George Washington and Simon Bolivar beat Hitler to it in shaping the destiny of the Western World, is bound that it shan't happen. On that, Republicans, Democrats, and new dealers are agreed. It we can get the Canadians and Brazilians and Mexicans and Ecuadorians all in agreement, maybe the combination can keep the New World safe for what is left of democracy.

SEVEN-YEAR REPORT OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate the 7-year report of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation covering its operations from February 2, 1932, to February 2, 1939, revised and amplified by inclusion of the financial statements of the Corporation and the agencies affiliated with it.

This is one of the most enlightening reports of a governmental agency I have ever read. More than $10,000,000,000 in private credits have been made available to agriculture, commerce, and industry; $7,243,000,000 has been disbursed and $5,372,000,000, or approximately 75 percent, repaid, leaving only $1,871,000,000 outstanding.

After paying all its operating expenses and $218,000,000 interest on the money it borrowed to lend, 90 percent of which went to the United States Treasury, the Corporation has accumulated earnings in excess of $200,000,000, which, in the opinion of R. F. C. directors, will be sufficient to cover all losses.

In summing up the activities of the Corporation, Hon. Jesse Jones, its Chairman, issued a statement which I ask may be printed at this point in the RECORD, and I also ask that the complete report itself be set out in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the 7-year report of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was ordered to be printed in the Appendix, and the statement of Hon. Jesse Jones was ordered to be printed in the RECORD at this point, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. JESSE JONES

The beneficiaries of R. F. C. activities have been almost entirely people of relatively small means or business interests. It is estimated that loans to closed banks benefited 20,000,000 depositors in these institutions; putting capital in banks probably saved another 20,000,000 depositors from loss or inconvenience. More than 3,000,000 commodity loans have been made to 1,500,000 farmers averaging less than $400 per loan. Probably 150,000 stockmen received loans averaging $1,600. More than 130,000 farmers and landowners in 26 States have benefited by loans to drainage, levee, and irrigation districts. More than 10,000 borrowers have received disaster loans averaging approximately $1,300, and 102,000 householders have received loans averaging less than $150 for the purchase of electrical appliances.

Two thousand seven hundred and twenty of the 7,371 loans to business enterprises have been for $5,000 or less, and 1,150 between $5,000 and $10,000; 6,088 of all loans to business have been for $50,000 or less. These loans to business have maintained employment for more than 400,000 people and have provided additional jobs for 225,000. Employment has been increased and business stimulated through the purchase of more than 32,000 home mortgages averaging approximately $4,000. Loans for the construction of business buildings and large-size housing projects have likewise increased employment and stimulated business.

Mining loans have created 1,500,000 days' work. Self-liquidating loans, exclusive of security purchases from P. W. A., have produced 181,000,000 man-hours of work, not counting the additional employment made necessary in the fabrication of materials for the construction involved and the employment of all classes of workers serving the business concerns which furnished the materials.

Loans to railroads for maintenance and for the purchase of equipment have been translated immediately into work for hundreds of thousands of workers, both skilled and unskilled—probably 20,000,000 days' work. Loans for payment of interest on railroad obligations went largely to savings banks, insurance companies, and other trust funds.

With the exception of loans on commodities, which are made largely by direction of Congress, both as to amount and basis, and upon which there will be some loss, this vast contribution to the business and economic life of our country during the past 7 years has been without any loss or cost to the Government.

In addition to R. F. C. loans authorized, and credit actually used, we have assisted a great many borrowers in getting loans from private sources by bringing borrower and lender together when, in our opinion, the loan applicant could properly be taken care of by banks or other private lending institutions, and by indicating that if necessary, to protect the applicant from failure or unnecessary loss, we would make the loan.

NEUTRALITY, PEACE, AND WAR

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, a few days ago, in discussing the subject of Wisconsin cheese, I interjected into the argument the statement:

> It does not create gas on the brain, and, without gas on the brain, this country will not go to war.

Since making that statement it has been quoted by many newspapers and I have received numerous letters. Particularly have I received letters from the Middle West, and I have also received some from Pennsylvania and New York as to my stand in relation to neutrality and war and peace. I will take a few moments, not to exceed 15 or 20 minutes, this afternoon to explain my stand on that subject.

Do we want war? The answer is unanimous. No, America does not want war. What do we want, then? We want peace and prosperity. And the old slogan applies: "Where there is a will, there is a way." I believe there is a practical way for America to obtain both these objectives. Briefly I shall discuss the problem of peace and war.

There are thousands of letters in my office, from my constituents in Wisconsin, and from others, indicating clearly, and I say this because I think it is important, that among the masses of the people there is almost a hysteria, an awful dread of war, and, thank God, there is also manifested a prayer for a practical way of escape from the danger of war.

Too often, however, in the letters that come to my office there is to be found an indication of hate of some other nation. To me that is a serious symptom. No matter where we stem from, in times of great national and international crises we should remember one thing, and that is that we are Americans. We owe no political allegiance to any other nation on earth. I am bringing these particular facts before the attention of the Senate because, in my opinion, as the Nation thinketh, so will the Nation's course for peace or war be determined. We cannot take time to hate Frenchmen, or Germans, or Englishmen, or Italians; but we can take time to love America and her institutions.

When you, Mr. President, and I, as so many politicians have done lately, take time to try to figure out what should be done about the European situation—we who have enough situations in America to think about and many ills to cure—we are not minding our own business. And when we permit ourselves to follow a war psychology, a war hysteria, or a fear that America's leadership, executive, legislative, and judicial is inadequate to save the situation, then we are traitors to the present.

A review of the events during recent years since the totalitarian powers have started upon their march to acquire more of the world's area a review of the events of recent years when the so-called democracies of Europe, fearing war and its consequences, as we fear it now in America, took no step to stop the onward march of the totalitarian states—in which period Manchukuo, Ethiopia, Czechoslovakia, and Austria were seized—will add nothing to the solution of our problem of maintaining peace and keeping away from entangling alliances.

In recent years the people have gotten into the mesmeric notion that the Government can do everything or anything, but they are now awakening to a realization of the implications and ill effect of many of the policies which have been pursued by the Government, such as continued spending in excess of receipts, the Government's two forms of tax—the capital gains tax and the undistributed profits tax—the A. A. A. and its effect on farming and industry, reducing the crop in one instance and thus reducing the number of persons employed, and at the same time reducing the purchasing power to buy the goods produced, such lessening of ability to buy leading to further reduction in the production of goods. Then we may consider the manner in which the W. P. A. is operated, giving a better standard of living to the W. P. A. employee than is received by persons dependent upon private employment and farm operations. Despite all the activities of the Government, 10,000,000 persons are still unemployed and a state of mind is evident in some quarters that Government control, Government ownership, is the remedy. We are awakening to the fact that Government actions and dependence on Government are unproductive of constructive result; that Government cannot do everything; and that the people must regain initiative, industry, and self-reliance.

So it is well for us to realize that only when the people want war will there be war. This will be true so long as we maintain our democracy. The important thing, then, is to keep our Republic intact and keep our minds poised, not stampeded; keep clear of the propaganda that comes from many quarters and keep ourselves free from entangling alliances.

I know of no Senator who wants war; and yet, from the tone of many letters, one might well think that representatives in Congress want to get America into war. The fact is that Congress, which alone has the power to declare war, is not stampeded. Almost every Senator I know is conscious of his responsibility. Of course, most of them are human, and when they rise to make speeches they indicate very clearly in what direction their sympathies lie. Putting on the senatorial toga does not make a man over. It should, however, sober him and make him more judicial.

How do I feel about the situation in Europe? That question is often asked, and I am going to tell the Senate frankly just how I feel. I have hope that war will not come even to Europe for some time, at least. I also feel that we shall develop enough vision, and I say, frankly, by that I mean that we shall get enough guidance and direction from Him who shaped us all so that we shall keep out of war, if it should come to Europe. I also hope that the white race, to whom God entrusted leadership on this globe—He has not entrusted it to any particular segment of that race—will wake up before it is too late and before some other race takes over the leadership on this globe.

I say that war is not inevitable. It is always darkest before the dawn. I believe that the common people of all the European countries hate war as we do. I believe that if the blinders could be torn off of the leaders of Europe, and they could have vision, they would see the way that leads toward international peace. Some Senators, perhaps, are not old enough to remember what blinders are. They used to be put on horses. I have not given up faith that something may occur so that the leaders of the nations may have vision, for we are told that "Where there is no vision the people perish"; and the opposite is true, that with vision we shall succeed.

We must not forget, as Garfield said after Lincoln died, that—

God reigns, and the Government at Washington lives.

Much, Mr. President, as you and I may love the folks "over there," it is not our country's business to aid in keeping or remaking Europe's map. There is too much tragedy in war, too much loss and no gain. Personally, I do not think we are blundering into war. If the people keep even-minded, we shall not get into war. It is only if some other nation should blunder and we should permit ourselves to become stampeded that we could get into war. That is why I am constantly repeating the need of keeping our minds poised, our thinking clear, and our emotions in check. We have a great battle to fight, but it is a battle for peace.

The other day, at a Senate committee hearing, the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] asked this significant question:

Have not the people already made up their minds who is right and who is wrong?

And he himself answered the question by saying:

The thing that is uppermost in my mind is that there is no neutrality at this time because of conditions that exist in the world. * * * We have practically passed upon who is an aggressor.

In this statement this great American statesman probably stated a fact, and that is that a large percentage of the American people feel that if war should come, the aggressors would be the totalitarian states.

Be that as it may, we should also bear in mind the fact that in the recent great World War a good many small nations, even in Europe, had the brains and the vision and the foresight to keep out of war, in spite of the fact that they, too, sympathized with one side or the other. Likewise we, who live 3,000 miles away, must realize that no matter where our sympathy lies, we, too, can and must keep out of war.

I repeat that I do not think war is coming to this country, and I believe that common sense is coming to the leaders of the world. I believe that when Mr. Hitler speaks on the 28th of this month we shall see that even into his brain there will have come something that will show that he appreciates that nothing can be gained by war.

Because of the human nature all of us—and I repeat that statement—because of racial backgrounds, because of our religious affiliations, our emotions, our biases, and our prejudices, it is natural that we should become partisan in some degree, especially in relation to cultural backgrounds; but if a crisis comes there is no room for partisanship as far as political allegiance is concerned.

This country demands and has a right to have 100 percent political allegiance from all of us; and the way to keep our allegiance unsullied, and keep America alone in our thoughts, is to think American. Let us not think German, French, or English, but American!

It is also my honest belief that in spite of the people having made up their minds as to "who is right or wrong," if war should come in Europe at least 95 percent of the people do not want America to get into that war. To keep ourselves out of the melee if it occurs—and, I repeat, in my opinion it is not necessary for Europe to go into war—the great need here is for moral and spiritual rearmament. In this Congress we have spent billions of dollars to build up physical armament, ships, and equipment of every kind; but now I am talking of the need for mental poise, spiritual balance, moral rearmament, if you please.

No matter what kind of a neutrality law is passed, or if no law is passed and we rely on international law—which some nations have attempted to set at naught—we should turn our attention to the solution of our domestic problems, and keep busy at that task, and not do as we did in the recent Spanish crisis. In the Spanish case, the people of America were not neutral. A large percentage mentally and actively sided with the Loyalists, while another large percentage mentally and openly sided with the Revolutionists.

At this time of crisis each individual in this Nation has the responsibility of building national unity, and that is not built by meddling in foreign affairs. I still believe that if enough individuals in the great nations of the world were engaged in the great challenge of moral rearmament, which involves using the spirit of honesty, faith, and love, we could dissolve the specter of war. It has to be done at some time. I also think that if we should get rid of our fears and our jealousies and our hates and our greed, our other problems, economic and political, would melt before our attack. I believe a growing body of people are coming to a recognition of this fact. We have tried other measures, but we have neglected the great way.

Our own plight in our own political and economic sphere, and in an international way, indicates that it is time for us to take another way out, and approach the solution of our problems through a new channel. If we do that I think our present sleeping sickness will disappear, our apathy will be gone, and we shall possess a desire to build anew by getting rid of selfishness and greed, fear and hatred.

The way of moral rearmament leads to the heights. Failure now to accept that challenge may mean national decay.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and a draft convention, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William E. Lee to be an Interstate Commerce Commissioner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of J. Haden Alldredge to be an Interstate Commerce Commissioner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the two vacancies just filled having existed for some time, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of these two nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Marine Corps.

Mr. BARKLEY. I make the same request about nominations in the Marine Corps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Marine Corps are confirmed en bloc.

That concludes the calendar.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, April 25, 1939, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 24, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Harry Lee Doll, rector of Christ Church, Alexandria, Va., offered the following prayer:

O Almighty God, the God of light and truth, before whom all that is hollow and unreal shrivels up and is consumed away, lighten the minds of these, Thy servants, to whom has been committed the leadership of this Nation, that they may not only see but perceive, may not only hear but understand. Increase in them Thy manifold gifts of grace, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and ghostly strength, the spirit of knowledge and true godliness, and fill them, O Lord, with the spirit of Thy holy fear that they, knowing whose ministers they are, may serve Thee and this people to the advancement of Thy kingdom on earth, and to the safety, honor, and welfare of this Nation. We ask it through Thyself made manifest, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 21, 1939, was read and approved.

APPLE BLOSSOM FESTIVAL, WINCHESTER, VA.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, the following is a telegram which I received this morning from the director general of the Winchester Apple Blossom Festival:

WINCHESTER, VA., April 24, 1939.

Hon. A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, M. C.,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

In behalf of the executive committee I wish to extend to you and the honorable Members of the House of Representatives a most cordial invitation to visit Winchester on the festive occasion of our sixteenth annual Shenandoah apple blossom festival Thursday and Friday, April 27 and 28. The crowning of Miss Genevieve Garner, the attractive granddaughter of our distinguished Vice President, JOHN NANCE GARNER, will be the initial event in a colorful and spectacular 2-day program. Looking forward to having many of our nearby Washington friends with us, I beg to remain,

Cordially yours,

TOM BALDRIDGE.

Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to extend this invitation to my colleagues in the House and to assure them that this is not just a gesture but an expression of our genuine desire to have them as our guests on this occasion.

Frederick and Augusta Counties were the first two Virginia counties to be formed west of the Blue Ridge Mountains. They were named in 1743 after Prince Frederick and his wife Augusta, who were the parents of George III. The original boundary of Frederick County took in much of northern Virginia and a portion of the Shenandoah Valley, and Augusta County took in the remainder of the Shenandoah Valley and extended to the upper reaches of the Mississippi. We want all the Members of the House who can do so to attend the court to be held by the queen of the apple blossoms but are especially anxious to have with us those whose ancestors knew and loved the beauties of the Shenandoah Valley.

The pageant alone, which will be given on the 27th and again on the 28th, will well justify the 70-mile trip, because I do not think a more beautiful one is staged anywhere in the country. And we believe that the sight of thousands of apple trees in bloom will be an inspiration to those who have never seen it. The flaming sword that drove Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden spared the trees, including Eve's apple tree. The thought has been portrayed in a beautiful canvas depicting Eve in old age being borne on a stretcher, and pointing to a clump of trees in the distance, she appears to be saying to her son Seth: "That is paradise." We hope a myriad of pink and white blossoms will be symbolic to you of paradise regained.

If those who can make this trip to Winchester will notify my office, I will be glad to make the necessary reservations for their entertainment. [Applause.]

ADDITIONAL MESSENGER, PRESS GALLERY

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution unanimously reported by the Committee on Accounts for present consideration, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 172

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $1,440 per annum for the services of an additional messenger to the press room of the House Press Gallery.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on two subjects, and to include in one of them a brief statement on our economic problem by an economist, and in the other one a brief statement concerning a book recently published by one of my constituents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address which I delivered commemorating the sesquicentennial of the Constitution, which was held in Lincoln Memorial Center, Washington, D. C., April 22, 1939, under the auspices of the Auxiliary of the United Spanish War Veterans of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a short article by Miss Betty Barten on the Spanish embargo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including a radio address delivered by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE REALITIES OF WAR

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, today Europe totters precariously on the brink of a precipice; its peoples are in the paralyzing clutch of fear that power-mad adventurers will plunge the world into a suicidal struggle. What each day will bring forth, no man knows. In America our legislative halls, our newspapers, our radios, our street corners all over the land resound with heated debates as to our foreign policy and the possibility of the United States becoming involved in war.

Twenty-two years ago this month we entered a war to make the world safe for democracy; the democratic ideal was never so threatened as it has been since the close of that conflict. It was to be a war to end all wars, and at the peace conference we laid the foundations for the next. We gave our money; the war debts were repudiated and we were called "Uncle Shylock." We gave food and clothing; they were soon forgotten. We gave the fresh young bodies of our boys; we broke the hearts and wounded the minds of millions who stayed at home, as well as of those who went into battle; we were told that we had entered the war too late to be of real assistance. We went to the so-called peace conference at Versailles, asking nothing. That is what we got. We went, hoping to pave the way for permanent peace; it turned out to be a revenge conference to sow the seeds of further destruction and hate. President Wilson was despised, denounced, deceived, and tricked.

Today we are once more asked to present a "united front of the democracies against totalitarian aggression." Again every possible appeal is being made to enlist us on the side of England and France—appeals to the sympathies of our hearts for the oppressed, to our consciences and sense of justice in the face of ruthless aggression, to our idealism in crusading for a better world, to our selfishness in the defense of our material interests. Is history repeating the dark days of 1914 to 1917?

Then, the people of Belgium had fallen in a desperate attempt to protect their borders against the invading hordes of the German war machine. Today, although territories have been seized, no war has been declared. Then, hundreds of American lives had been lost in savage submarine warfare upon neutral nations. That is not true today. Then, American ships and American property had been sunk and were constantly in danger. Today our only fear is the possible loss of some of our markets.

CANNOT DICTATE WORLD POLICIES

Then there was far more excuse for the incitement of a war spirit than there is now. Then a general European conflict was raging; American lives and property were at stake; American public opinion had been far more outraged than it is today. Then we had not learned that we cannot dictate the governments of other peoples. We had not learned that freedom and democracy cannot be forced upon them. We had not learned that war is not the cure for war. Today we have the tragic and bitter experience of the last World War as evidence of these truths, but we do not seem to be any the wiser.

Every true American must shudder at world conditions. Every true American hates aggression and the oppression of the weak by the strong. Yet we must remember that the democracies are responsible for the plight of the world today. On the hands of the Allies is the blood of Austria and Czechoslovakia, of Ethiopia and Albania, for it was they who made possible the rise of power-mad dictators. They made the Treaty of Versailles, and they have only themselves to thank for the results.

We must realize the truth of the statement of Senator BORAH when he declares that the present crisis is economic in its aspects, rather than a struggle between the democratic and totalitarian ideals. We must remember that Germany, who was slaughtered, and Italy, who was ignored as England and France grabbed the spoils at Versailles, are now doing precisely what England and France did for centuries. Many of you within the sound of my voice will remember their last imperialistic conquests. The British seized Nigeria in 1886, Somaliland in 1887, British East Africa in 1888, Rhodesia in 1889, British Central Africa in 1893, and Uganda in 1896. In 1889 they conducted a war against the white Boers, without even so much as the excuse offered by Mussolini that he was bringing civilization to Ethiopia.

As for the French, they took Tunis in 1878, Annan and Tonkin from China and Laos from Siam in 1887. They gained their foothold in Madagascar in 1885, and the conquest was complete by 1896. To these must be added the seizure of Djibouti, Dahomey, and later, of Morocco and Germany's colonies and Arab dominions in Asia and Africa. The British and French foreign offices are none too proud today of many pages in the history of their imperial expansion.

To recognize these facts is not to condone the conduct of the dictators. It is to explain the reason for their rise to power, and why they believe their expansions are as justified as were those of England and France during the last century. It is not to say that English and French hearts do not ache for the victims of German, Italian, and Japanese aggressions; it is to realize that they are at least equally concerned with the protection of their colonial empires and the routes to those possessions. It is not to deny that American sympathies must naturally be with the weak and oppressed; it is rather to warn against the fallacy of fighting to uphold English and French imperial interests in the name of humanity. It is to beware of a repetition of "the war to end all wars."

CIVILIZATION AT STAKE

Did I say repetition? The next war will not merely repeat the disasters and tragedies of the last. It will be inexpressibly more horrible. It will shake the very foundations of civilization itself. It will mean the stench and gore of the World War trenches 20 times magnified. But there will be no frontline trenches in the next war. They will be brought to the homes of hundreds of thousands of innocent women and children. The battleground will be every city, every village and hamlet within hundreds of miles of every air base. Instead of troops going "over the top" to meet opposing forces, bombers will fly over the tops of cities, as they did in Spain, raining destruction down upon the helpless young, weak, and aged. If London or Paris should be bombed, it is possible that broadcasting stations will announce to the world the progress of the attack, punctuated by the roar of enemy planes, the shrieks of fire engines, and the death screams of women and children. The Wellsian fantasy of attack from Mars will be a child's dream by comparison.

These grim facts, which must appall every imagination and cause every heart to quaver, are agreed to by every military expert in the world. They would have been impossible 20 years ago, but they will be the war of tomorrow. Such are the new instruments of terror that man has created for his destruction since he fought the war to end all wars.

Yet today we have in this country an administration that has prepared for war ever since it took office. The industrial-mobilization plan, although not yet law, is the vast structure of the War and Navy Departments in preparation for taking over not only all material resources but the control of all industry, trade, and commerce. Already the Nation has been divided into districts, with regional headquarters of the War Department to be located in each. Already the wartime value of over 20,000 American factories has been charted. Already more than 12,000 plants have been assigned to various Army supply branches and have signed an "accepted schedule of production."

AN ASTOUNDING DOCUMENT

The industrial-mobilization plan is undoubtedly the most astounding document ever to be published in a democracy. Its foreword states, with amazing frankness, that—

> It is conceivable that a war might be conducted with such great regard for individual justice * * * as to make impossible those evils whose existence in past wars is well known. It is also conceivable that the outcome of a war so conducted might be defeat.

The plan provides for a war resources administration, a war labor administration, a war trade administration, a war finance control commission, a price control commission, and an advisory defense council to establish a military dictatorship the minute war is declared. Capital and labor alike are to be conscripted, business and industry licensed or commandeered, food and all necessities of life rationed. Every means of communication and transmitting news is to be controlled. The only liberty left to the individual will be the freedom to think, and he will not dare to express his thoughts.

The industrial-mobilization plan recognizes only two classes of citizens—those with the armed forces and those at home who must provide for the maintenance of the armed forces. Thus the war labor administration will regiment all labor from the highest paid expert down to the humblest domestic servant. Under the title "Woman Wage Earner's Division" one finds the startling statement:

> In normal times there are approximately 10,000,000 women and children over 16 years of age employed in industry, commerce, and the professions. The specific mission of this division is to divert the greatest possible number of these * * * to munitions and essential civilian industries.

The work of the women's division will be divided among three sections. The first section will be of women labor employed in commercial and routine office occupations.

This section recommends—

According to the printed pamphlet—methods to meet the needs of war and essential civilian industries for trained women. This includes the transfer of women factory workers from plants of lesser to those of greater essentiality.

In other words, in time of war, women may be herded about like cattle at the discretion of the war labor administrator.

There is also to be a children's division. As to this, the industrial-mobilization plan declares:

While the employment of children under the age of 16 years in industry or agriculture will be avoided wherever possible, it must be recognized from the beginning that the nature of the emergency may require such employment in its later stages.

Here we have a picture of what life in America will be like if we go to war; a picture of mothers being taken from their children and shipped to some far-away factory; a picture of schools being closed as children, too, become cogs in the vast war machine that has sprung up. It is a picture that must make every American shudder, yet few even know of its existence. Would the American people be willing to go to war on foreign soil if they knew the truth?

In addition to the power to commandeer lives as well as all resources and supplies, bills have been introduced in Congress during the last few years which propose to give the President not only absolute control of our entire national economy but unlimited access to the Federal Treasury, free of even the necessity of making an accounting of expenditures to Congress until after the war is over. The next war is to leave us destitute financially as well as economically, physically, and spiritually. These measures have not become law, but they demonstrate only too clearly the powers which the administration seeks and plans to sweep through Congress on the wave of manufactured emotionalism that will accompany a declaration of war.

MANUFACTURE EMOTIONALISM

Administration spokesmen have been persistently manufacturing this emotionalism to condition the mind of America for war. I make no charge that President Roosevelt or any of his spokesmen are deliberately trying to lead this country into war. That is a charge so serious that I would level it at no man or woman until I were in possession of absolute evidence that such was the case. But what I do say is that the administration spokesmen, from the President down, have been unwise and provocative in their fulminations against other countries and other governments. Regardless of whether or not these administration spokesmen were following what they may have believed was a line of endeavor calculated to cause the dictator nations to pause in their warlike actions, it still remains a fact that the intemperate and provocative utterances of these administration spokesmen have tended toward antagonizing and embittering those nations and their peoples against the United States and the democracies rather than otherwise.

Recall, for example, the President's speech in Chicago, in which he advocated the quarantine of the aggressor nations, and his speech in Canada that the United States would protect that Dominion in case of invasion, although such a possibility was and still is fantastic. Recall his implications at a conference with the Senate Military Affairs Committee, which afterward became the subject of acrimonious debate and a question of veracity. Recall his frequent remarks as he was about to depart on trips that he might have to cut short these vacations in case of war. Remember his statement upon leaving Warm Springs, Ga., "I'll be back in the fall if we don't have war," followed by a press conference in which he confirmed the fear that the term "we" included the United States. Remember his ringing speech before the Pan American Union, in which he proclaimed that "We have a stake in world affairs," and accompanied that statement by the threat of "matching force to force." Remember the sudden recalling of the Pacific Fleet to the west coast for no apparent reason.

SOWING SEEDS OF WAR

Remember the constant assaults made by administration spokesmen against the Italian, German, and Japanese Governments during this period. All of these have added up to a pattern. That pattern today is plain. All of these verbal assaults have served to keep the American people in a constant state of alarm and have tended to make them resigned to war as inevitable. In England and France these declarations, particularly those of the President, have been joyfully acclaimed because they have been interpreted as insuring the unqualified support of the United States, military as well as financial, in case of a war in Europe. These declarations have been received in Germany, Italy, and Japan as constituting deliberate war-provoking efforts and have led those people to regard the President of the United States as the leader of a world bloc against them.

Day and night American ears are dinned with demands that we join the democracies in a holy crusade against the dictatorships. Day and night they tell us that we cannot have peace unless we are willing to police the world. They would have us believe that we cannot be a prosperous people until we have righted all wrongs everywhere. In the name of humanity they chant a hymn of hate. As champions of man's highest ideals they appeal to his basest passions. They call for peace, but they sow the seeds of war.

The President and his followers speak always with an air of final authority. Have the people no voice in the shaping of their destiny? Have they not the right to choose between life and death? They will not fail to defend to the uttermost all that is sacred and dear to their hearts; but they rebel against being forced into war by propaganda and false idealism. They must not be misled by saber rattling and jingoism. They have the right to a voice in the shaping of foreign policy and in any decision for war. They must exercise this right through that branch of the Government which is most responsive to their will. They must make their will known to their representatives in Congress.

We must decide, we Americans, whether we will take it upon ourselves to settle every foreign conflict that arises or whether we will steadfastly pursue the path of peace and progress, whether we will be drawn into a suicidal struggle which no democracy will survive or whether we will preserve democracy by keeping it alive at home.

If we are to remain at peace in the event of a European war, we must first have the will for peace. We cannot stay out of war by being hopelessly resigned in advance to being inevitably drawn into the conflict. We must have the will for peace, and we must have more. We must have the courage and the vision to dedicate our hearts and minds to the task of working constructively for peace, in word and in need.

We cannot dictate the destinies of all mankind. But we can do all that lies within our power to preserve, in at least one great part of the earth, the light of ideals toward which man has struggled, the liberties he has cherished, and the civilization he has created through the centuries, for future ages.

WHAT WAR ACTUALLY MEANS

Mr. Speaker, from millions of lips in America the word "war" falls. In thousands of newspaper columns the word "war" appears. Over the air waves night and day the word "war" vibrates. Of what do we speak when we utter the word "war"?

Blaring bands; martial airs; gaudy uniforms; ringing cheers; the rhythm of marching feet; the glint of sunlight on shining bayonets and polished guns; the skies darkened by flocks of airplanes; the air drumming and vibrant with the drone of motors; panoply, parade; but back of that, what?

The unutterable ache, the unplumbed agony of human hearts and human souls as fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, sweethearts, children bid farewell to their loved ones as they go marching away, perhaps never to return. Long months—aye, years—of the hopeless agony of waiting for some word as to whether those loved ones still live.

In the fields of Europe the mud and water and vermin and stench of the trenches.

Men, unkempt, unshaven, cold, literally drunk from loss of sleep, hopeless, horror ridden, waiting in the darkness before the dawn for the zero hour to go over the top.

Sleek, audacious rats—trench rats—fattened on the flesh of the fallen, scurrying along the trench ways, brushing the feet of men who will soon be victims.

The eerie greenish light of the rockets, the hellish thunder and roll of cannon, the rattle of machine guns. Across a sea of mud, churned into muck by the feet of fighting men, mixed with that muck the mangled bits of flesh of those who were the beloved of American fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters and wives and children—men whose bodies are blasted into minced meat to be churned up in the blood and mud on no man's land.

Out yonder as the gray dawn brings the hour for a new struggle, torn bodies hanging limp and grotesque, bloody and mangled, on the barbed-wire entaglements—the bodies of American sons.

Over all the awful mist of the early morning rising from that carnal earth, a stench, a miasma of death in the nostrils of the living.

That, my friends, is what we talk about when we pronounce the awful word "war."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including an editorial from the Iron Age on War, Overproduction, and Unemployment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ECONOMIC PROBLEM NO. 1

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, not long ago our distinguished Chief Executive saw fit to refer to the South as "Economic problem No. 1." Coming from that great section for whose hallowed heritages and noble traditions I entertain the greatest loyalty and affection, I resent this gratuitous aspersion of our President. And in refutation of this groundless imputation I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point and include a brief statement of Mr. Roger W. Babson, an outstanding American economist.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FASTEST GROWING STATES ARE IN SOUTH, BABSON SAYS—CALLS INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT OF DIXIE SENSATIONAL, WITH 25 PERCENT OF UNITED STATES MANUFACTURING PLANTS

(By Roger W. Babson)

SAVANNAH, GA., April 16.—After a winter spent in the South it is hard to be pessimistic on this section, even though cotton is selling for only 8 cents a pound. Far from being economic problem No. 1, I think the South is possibly No. 1 of the United States. Eliminate freight-rate differentials, speed up the diversification of the farms, utilize the water-power developments, and Dixie can lift the United States into a period of business prosperity.

The South is making huge programs each year. The fastest-growing States in the Union are nearly all in the South. Texas, Florida, Louisiana, the Carolinas are boosting their populations about three times as fast as the North. Literally hundreds of communities that were unheard of 10 years ago are thriving towns today. Every one of the chief cities in the United States whose populations have doubled since 1920 is below the Mason and Dixon line!

The story of the South's industrial growth is even more sensational. More than half the new factory development of the entire country in recent years has been down there. Today Dixie has over 25 percent of the manufacturing establishments of the United States. And they keep mushrooming up everywhere. Northern concerns continue to flow toward the Gulf, while entirely new industries are springing up all across the South. Reasonable labor costs, savings in fuel, nearness to raw materials, cheap power, low taxes, and water transportation are among the big sales points in the South's spectacular growth.

Latest new industry is newsprint. The first mill is under construction in Texas. It may be the forerunner of a southward trek of northern and Canadian newsprint mills. Slash pine is the raw material. It grows three times as fast as northern spruce. Other branches of the paper industry—particularly kraft—are going strong in Dixie. The southern chemical business is growing by leaps and bounds. Textile mills continue to multiply. Seventy percent of our rayon output comes from the South. The center of the booming petroleum business is in the Southwest.

The end of the so-called "basing point" price system for steel should help all southern industry. Once it was just as cheap to buy a ton of Pittsburgh-made steel delivered at Birmingham as it was to buy a ton of Birmingham-made steel. Now the ton of southern steel is cheaper. Hence, foundries, forges, stamping mills, and other metal fabricators that have concentrated around northern steel towns will find it advantageous to have branch factories near the southern steel industry. All winter Birmingham steel mills were much busier than those in the North.

Present freight rates are unfair to the South. Smash up these rates and the products of southern factories and farms can be laid down at northern doors at a real saving to consumers. If we believe in a gradual lowering of world-trade barriers, we ought to eliminate such barriers within our own borders. Present freight-rate differentials amount to a tariff on southern products. The biggest boon to the South now would be the changing of these rates.

The problem which has plagued Dixie for years—dependence on one crop—is on its way to solution. Diversification of farms is speeding up. Low feed costs are stimulating livestock raising and dairy farming. Meanwhile, the chemists are finding industrial uses for new crops, such as soybeans, tung trees, and sweetpotatoes and for older crops, such as cotton, tobacco, and peanuts. Hence, while King Cotton is a mighty sick man, the southern agricultural outlook is very bright.

Among the South's greatest assets are her water-power resources. The T. V. A. development is a great thing. If it is administered wisely and fairly, the huge power surplus should be completely utilized. Air conditioning has played a big part in recent southern growth and, stimulated by cheap power, will continue to do so. We hear much about low wages in Dixie. People overlook the fact, however, that living costs in the South are very cheap. A house costing $5,000 to build in New England can be put up in the South for about $3,500, and can be heated for about $50 per year less. Food—particularly farm produce—sells for a song. After lower living costs are considered, southern wages are not too far out of line.

Certainly, if I were a young man I would come down here in the South to "seek my fortune." We need more trained men here. Why stay in New York, Philadelphia, or Boston and starve when you can come down here where you can live comfortably and where you are really needed? Today, for instance, 9 out of 18 States which are rated as excellent business territories on my sales map are in the South. Get in on the ground floor of this southern growth just as your forefathers got in on the ground floor of the industrial growth of the West. Decentralization of industry through the industrial use of farm products is on the way. What better spot in the world for it than here in the "sunny" South.

Now, just a word in closing to my southern neighbors: Ever since I have been visiting your section—16 winters now—I have been conscious of sectional, racial, and religious prejudices here. Such prejudices are foolish and destructive. They are holding back your development. You in the South have everything—good climate, reasonable labor, vast raw materials, and plenty of water power. Your one draw-back is a failure to cooperate enthusiastically. I beg of you not to shackle your tremendous advantages by outworn prejudices.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by including an address made by the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, after the disposition of the legislative calendar, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, after the regular order of business, I may address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TEMPORARY DETAIL OF UNITED STATES EMPLOYEES TO GOVERNMENTS OF AMERICAN REPUBLICS AND THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3134) to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the temporary detail of United States employees, possessing special qualifications, to governments of American republics and the Philippines, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1938, with a Senate amendment, and agree to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the act entitled 'An act authorizing the temporary detail of United States employees, possessing special qualifications, to governments of American Republics and the Philippines, and for other purposes', approved May 25, 1938, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

" 'That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized, whenever he finds that the public interest renders such a course advisable, upon agreement with the government of any other American Republic or the Government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, or the Government of Liberia, if such government is desirous of obtaining the services of a person having special scientific or other technical or professional qualifications, other than those persons covered by the act of May 19, 1926 (44 Stat. 565), as amended by the act of May 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 218), from time to time to detail for temporary service of not exceeding 1 year at a time, under such government, any such person in the employ of the Government of the United States: Provided, That the President may, in extraordinary circumstances, extend the period of such detail for one or more additional periods of not to exceed 6 months each: Provided further, That while so detailed, such person shall be considered, for the purpose of preserving his rights and privileges as such, an officer or employee of the Government of the United States and of the department or agency from which detailed and shall continue to receive therefrom compensation, and he may receive additional compensation from the department or agency from which detailed not to exceed 50 percent of the compensation he was receiving as an officer or employee of the United States at the time of detail, and shall receive from the United States reimbursement for travel expenses to and from the place of detail and monthly allowances determined by the President to be adequate for quarters and subsistence during the period of such detail. The additional compensation, travel expenses, and other allowances authorized by this act to be paid to any such officer or employee shall be paid from any appropriations available for the payment of compensation and travel expenses of the officers and employees of the department or agency from which he is detailed: Provided, however, That if any government to which a detail is authorized by this act shall express the desire to reimburse this Government in whole or in part for the expenses of such detail, the President is authorized, when he deems it in the public interest, to accept such reimbursement and the amount so received may be credited to (a) appropriations current at the time the expenses of such detail are to be or have been paid, (b) appropriations current at the time such amounts are received, or (c) in part as provided under (a) and in part as provided under (b) hereof; and such amount shall be available for the purposes of the appropriations to which credited: And provided further, That if any such government shall express the desire to provide advances of funds to be used by this Government, in whole or in part for the expenses of such detail, the President is authorized, when he deems it in the public interest, to accept such advances of funds, and the amounts so received may be established as a trust fund, to be available for the purpose and under the provisions of this act until the termination of the detail; any unexpended balance of the trust fund to be returned to the foreign government making the advance.' "

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this is a long bill, and I object to it until I have had an opportunity to study it further.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4630) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the conference report and statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4630) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 9, 10, 16, 17, 19, 20, 23, 27, 32, and 35.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 14, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 28, and 29, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "thirteen thousand one hundred and six"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$7,185,834"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$6,750,087"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$170,371,405"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 15: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,927,020"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$15,525,061"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$10,896,937"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$500,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 34: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$4,964,544"; and the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4360) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

On amendment No. 1: Strikes out, as proposed by the Senate, the House provisions practically limiting administrative promotions of employees in the War Department proper to the incumbents of positions in the lower-pay grades.

On amendment Nos. 2 to 14, inclusive, relating to pay of the Army: Provides for 75 additional officers (50 medical and 25 dental), instead of 390 additional officers, as proposed by the Senate, entailing a total additional expense on account of officers of $141,066; provides for 36 medical officers to be in a flight-pay status, as proposed by the Senate, instead of 5, as proposed by the House, limiting, however, flight pay of such officers to a rate not in excess of $720 per annum, as proposed by the Senate; strikes out the increase of 346, proposed by the Senate in the enlisted strength of the Army, and corrects the approval date of a cited statute, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 15: Appropriates $2,927,020 for "Travel of the Army," instead of $2,919,520, as proposed by the House, and $2,961,980, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 16: Appropriates $29,510,250 for "Subsistence of the Army," as proposed by the House, instead of $29,661,798, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 17: Appropriates $12,463,900 for "Clothing and equipage," as proposed by the House, instead of $12,508,658, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 18: Appropriates $15,525,061 for "Army transportation" instead of $15,509,875 as proposed by the House and $15,556,561, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 19 and 20, relating to horses, draft, and pack animals: Provides $92,030 for horse-breeding activities, as proposed by the House, instead of $97,430, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 21 and 22, relating to military posts: Appropriates $2,014,400 for projects at Albrook Field, Canal Zone, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $514,400, as proposed by the House.

On amendments Nos. 23 to 26, inclusive, relating to the Air Corps: Appropriates $94,737,281, as proposed by the House, instead of $95,737,281, as proposed by the Senate, and divorces from the amount proposed by the House for the procurement of airplanes the amount to be applied to the procurement of spare parts on account of such airplanes, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 27: Appropriates $1,551,072 for "Medical and Hospital Department," as proposed by the House, instead of $1,553,840, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 28: Appropriates $53,173,100 for "Ordnance service and supplies, Army," as proposed by the Senate, instead of $46,840,620, as proposed by the House, $6,000,000 of this additional amount being supported by a supplemental estimate.

On amendment No. 29: Changes the title of the appropriation relating to instruction in cavalry activities, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 30 to 33, inclusive, relating to the National Guard: Makes available for construction at National Guard camps $1,000,000, instead of $2,000,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $625,000, as proposed by the House; makes available for construction at concurrent camps not to exceed $500,000, instead of $710,360, as proposed by the Senate, and $100,000, as proposed by the House, earmarking being omitted, and restores the House provision making $500,000 available for increasing the strength of the National Guard, amended by omitting restriction upon the extent of the increase other than as controlled by available funds.

On amendments Nos. 34 and 35, relating to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps: Appropriates $4,964,544, instead of $4,825,842, as proposed by the House, and $5,592,411, as proposed by the Senate, the increase of $138,702 being intended to provide for increasing the number of advanced-course students by approximately 1,435, or to 18,000, and restores the limitations stricken out by the Senate upon the establishment or reestablishment of certain types of units.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD at this point a statement concerning the report just adopted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, the War Department appropriation bill as it passed the House carried appropriations totaling $499,857,936. That amount was $941,944 below the Budget estimates.

The Senate added to the bill $13,330,946, or $12,389,002 without Budget support. Subsequently an estimate came in covering $6,000,000 of that amount.

Your conferees have agreed to increases totaling $3,931,833. Subtracting from that sum the $6,000,000 for which we have a supplemental estimate and the amount by which the House bill came under the Budget, namely, $941,944, the bill in its present stage exceeds Budget recommendations by $1,989,944. Facially, however, the bill is $17,516,044 below Budget recommendations, because the House substituted contractual authority of $19,505,988 in lieu of the immediate appropriation of a like amount.

The increases to which we have agreed are incident to the following propositions:

50 additional Medical and 25 additional Dental Corps officers	$141,066
Flight pay for 31 additional medical officers	44,640
Construction at Albrook Field, C. Z	1,500,000
Modernizing 40 75-mm. guns	332,480
Replacement of machinery in manufacturing arsenals, for which there is a Budget estimate	6,000,000
Construction at National Guard camps	375,000
Construction at concurrent camps	400,000
Additional advanced course, R. O. T. C. students	138,702
Total	8,931,888

The Senate added to the bill a total of $2,041,828 for the establishment of 54 additional R. O. T. C. units and for increasing the officer instructors with existing units. That meant the addition of 315 officers over and above the 446 promotion list officers for which the House bill had made provision, and disregarded the further additional 311 Air Corps officers the Department expects to ask funds for later at this session. The War Department objected to the addition of so many officers at one time and also to taking away from the Army experienced officers for R. O. T. C. work and substituting for them inexperienced second lieutenants, wholly unsuited to the task confronting the Army at this time in the way of matériel development and expansion.

For the present, therefore, there is to be no R. O. T. C. expansion beyond the increase for which the bill makes provision in the number of advanced course students.

As to the National Guard, the House raised from $125,000 to $625,000 the Budget estimate for camp construction. The Senate proposed to increase this amount to $2,000,000. We have agreed upon an allowance of $1,000,000, or $375,000 more than the House had proposed.

As to concurrent camps, the House provided $100,000. The Senate raised this amount to $710,360, earmarking the increase for Fort Sill, Okla. Your conferees would not agree to any earmarking and agreed upon an allowance of not to exceed $500,000.

WAR DEBTS AND COASTAL ISLANDS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution by Garrett Cochran Post, No. 1, of the American Legion, Department of Pennsylvania, relative to payment of foreign debts to the United States, of the twelve billion and more now owing by Great Britain, France, Italy, and other countries.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a fine resolution and if we could purchase some very valuable property at a proper price and terms it would be a fine thing to do.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. This is District of Columbia day. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is recognized.

WIDENING OF WISCONSIN AVENUE

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H. R. 5488) to provide for the widening of Wisconsin Avenue in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to institute in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia under subchapter 1 of chapter XV of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, and amendments thereto, such proceedings in rem as may be necessary to condemn the land necessary for the widening of Wisconsin Avenue, in the District of Columbia, from R Street to approximately the southerly line of the Mount Alto Hospital property, the condemnation proceedings for the acquisition of the land necessary for said widening to be instituted on such lines and to be acquired to such width or widths as the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall deem expedient: Provided, That the width of said Wisconsin Avenue at any point south of the south line of Calvert Street shall not be increased by reason of the condemnation proceedings authorized herein to a greater width than 78 feet.

SEC. 2. All laws now in force and effect for the condemnation of streets as laid down on the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia shall be applicable to the condemnation of land for the widening of Wisconsin Avenue as authorized in this act: Provided, That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the special fund entitled "Highway fund, gasoline tax, and motor-vehicle fees, District of Columbia," such amount or amounts as may be necessary to pay the costs and expenses of the condemnation proceedings taken pursuant hereto and for the payment of the amounts awarded as damages, and the jury or juries under said condemnation proceedings shall award such damages as may be found to be due, and levy assessments upon such land as they may find benefited by reason of the acquisition of said land for the widening of Wisconsin Avenue as provided herein, all in accordance with subchapter 1 of chapter XV of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia and amendments thereto, and the amounts collected as benefits shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the special fund entitled "Highway fund, gasoline tax, and motor-vehicle fees, District of Columbia."

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of the measure, this bill merely authorizes the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to carry on such negotiations as may be necessary to proceed with the widening of Wisconsin Avenue from R Street to Mount Alto Hospital.

I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FEES OF UNITED STATES MARSHAL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H. R. 5679) to amend the Code of Law of the District of Columbia in respect to fees of the United States marshal, and I ask unanimous consent that the same may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 1112 of the act of March 3, 1901, chapter 854, entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," as amended (46 Stat. 486; D. C. Code, Supp. II, title 10, sec. 10), be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1112. Marshal's fees: For each return on any warrant, attachment, summons, capias, or other writ (except execution, venire, or a summons or subpena for a witness), whether or not service has been made, $1 for each person: Provided, however, That for the return on any citation, summons, notice, or rule issued by the probate court the fee shall be 50 cents for each person. For making or attempting to make service of any of the foregoing papers, the marshal shall charge and collect, in addition to the fee for the return thereof, 10 cents for each person served and 10 cents for each unsuccessful attempt to serve each person."

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the measure that is before us simply allows the marshal for the District of Columbia to charge and collect 10 cents for each successful or unsuccessful attempt to serve persons.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. PACE. Does this apply to the marshal of the District of Columbia or to marshals of the United States district courts?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The District of Columbia. The marshals in the United States district courts operate under such a law at the present time. They are authorized under existing law to charge 6 cents a mile. This bill, I might say, brings the District of Columbia in line with the practice throughout the various districts in the States.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of information to the Members, several of whom have asked me about the so-called fair trade practices bill, which was on the calendar for today, I may state that, at the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY], this bill has been laid over. It will perhaps come before the House 2 weeks from today.

Mr. Speaker, this completes the business on the District Calendar for today.

STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (Rept. No. 466), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

House Resolution 173

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5191, a bill to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for armed forces and the civilian population in time of national emergency, and to encourage the development of these resources within the United States, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

AVIATION CADETS

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (Rept. No. 467), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

House Resolution 171

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5765, a bill to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves upon completion of training, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

PROMOTION OF LINE OFFICERS OF THE NAVY

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (Rept. No. 468), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 170

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 4929, a bill to amend the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 944). That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bills and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SANDAGER (at the request of Mr. RISK), for April 24 and 25, on account of important business at home.

To Mr. SECCOMBE, for the remainder of the week, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. HEALEY, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. H. CARL ANDRESEN, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PACE). Under the special order of the House heretofore made, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. I yield.

COMMITTEE ON LABOR

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House today for the consideration of amendments to the wage-hour bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. REED of New York and Mr. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY asked and were given permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

THE MACHINERY OF CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT SET IN MOTION

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, 150 years ago yesterday, April 23, 1789, at about 3 p. m., George Washington, first President-elect of the United States, landed from a barge at Murray's Wharf in New York City. This completed a journey begun on April 16, 1789, from his home at Mount Vernon. On this journey he had been accompanied by Charles Thomson, Secretary of the Continental Congress, and Col. David Humphreys. His journey had been a triumphal march.

He had been rowed across the bay from Elizabeth port in a barge specially built for this occasion. James Nicholson was the commander and Thomas Randall, coxswain. The barge was rowed by 13 masters of vessels then lying in the harbor; these men wore white uniforms and black caps ornamented with fringe. It was accompanied by 6 other barges. Aboard these barges were the members of the committee appointed to meet General Washington and the members of his party. The Senate committee was composed of John Langdon, Charles Carroll, and William Samuel Johnson. The House committee consisted of Elias Boudinot, Theodoric Bland, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Egbert Benson, and John Lawrence. Other members of this committee were Chancelor Livingston; John Jay, at the time Secretary of Foreign Affairs; Samuel Osgood, Arthur Lee, and Walter Livingston, Commissioners of the Treasury; General Knox, head of the War Department; Ebenezer Hazard, Postmaster General, Ccl. Nicholas Fish, the adjutant general of the forces of the State of New York; Richard Varick; and several others.

The following description of the trip up the bay was written by Elias Boudinot, one of the congressional committee who met General Washington:

When we drew near the mouth of the Kills, a number of boats with various flags came up with us and dropped in our wake. Soon after we entered the bay General Knox and several other officers in a large barge presented themselves with their splendid colors. Boat after boat, sloop after sloop, gayly dressed in all their naval ornaments, added to our train and made a most splendid appearance. Before we got to Bedloes Island a large sloop came with full sail on our starboard bow, when there stood up about 20 gentlemen and ladies, who with most excellent voices sung an elegant ode, prepared for the purpose, to the tune of God Save the King, welcoming their great chief to the seat of government. On its conclusion we saluted them with our hats, and then they with the surrounding boats gave us three cheers. Soon after another boat came under our stern and presented us with a number of copies of a second ode, and immediately about a dozen gentlemen began to sing it in parts as we passed along. Our worthy President was greatly affected with these tokens of profound respect. As we approached the harbor our train increased, and the huzzaing and shouts of joy seemed to add life to this brilliant scene. At this moment a number of porpoises came playing among us, as if they had risen up to know what was the cause of all this happiness.

We now discovered the shores to be crowded with thousands of people;—men, women, and children; nay, I may venture to say tens of thousands. From the fort to the place of landing, although nearly half a mile, you could see little else along the shore, in the streets, and on board every vessel but heads, standing as thick as ears of corn before the harvest. The vessels in the harbor made a most superb appearance, indeed, dressed in all their pomp of attire.

The Spanish ship of war, the Galveston, in a moment, on a signal given, discovered 27 or 28 different colors, of all nations, on every part of the rigging, and paid us the compliment of 13 guns, with her yards all manned, as did also another vessel in the harbor, the North Carolina, displaying colors in the same manner. We soon arrived at the ferry stairs where there were many thousands of the citizens waiting with all the eagerness of expectation to welcome our excellent patriot to that shore which he regained from a powerful enemy by his valor and good conduct. We found the stairs covered with carpeting and the rails hung with crimson. The President, being preceded by the committee, was received by the Governor and the citizens in the most brilliant manner.

Upon landing the President-elect was greeted by the firing of cannon and the ringing of bells.

A procession headed by Col. Morgan Lewis was waiting to receive him. It consisted of a band, a troop of horse, artillery officers off duty, a company of grenadiers who served as a guard of honor, the Governor and officers of the State of New York, James Duane, the corporation council of the city of New York, members of the clergy, the French and Spanish diplomatic representatives, and a large number of private citizens. The parade passed by Governor Clinton's house and finally arrived at the Franklin House, at the corner of Franklin and Cherry Streets, which had been especially fitted up as the Presidential residence. A tablet on the Brooklyn Bridge now marks the site of this first Executive Mansion. Here the President-elect was to wait until his inauguration as the first President of the United States on April 30, 1789.

A brief review of the events preceding this occasion will be both informative and interesting. At sunset on March 3, 1789, 13 guns were fired from the old fort on the Battery in New York. This announced the death of the old Confederation of States. Early on the morning of the 4th a salute of 11 guns in honor of the 11 States that had adopted the Constitution was fired. This salute accompanied by the ringing of bells announced the birth of the new Government created by the Constitution.

However, the machinery of the new government under the Constitution was not to be set in motion until almost a month later. This was due to the tardiness of the Members in making their appearance.

RESOLUTION OF THE CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATION

In the resolution of the Congress of the Confederation of September 13, 1788, fixing dates for election of a President and the organization of the Government under the Constitution in the city of New York, we find the following:

Congress assembled. Present: New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia; and from Rhode Island, Mr. Arnold, and from Delaware, Mr. Kearny.

Whereas the Convention assembled in Philadelphia pursuant to the resolution of Congress on the 21st of February 1787 did, on the 17th of September in the same year, report to the United States in Congress assembled a Constitution for the people of the United States, whereupon Congress on the 28th of the same September did resolve unanimously—

That the said report with the resolutions and letter accompanying the same be transmitted to the several legislatures in order to be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof in conformity to the resolves of the Convention made and provided in that case; and

Whereas the Constitution so reported by the Convention and by Congress transmitted to the several legislatures has been ratified in the manner therein declared to be sufficient for the establishment of the same and such ratifications duly authenticated have been received by Congress and are filed in the office of the secretary: Therefore

Resolved, That the first Wednesday in January next be the day for appointing electors in the several States, which before the said day shall have ratified the said Constitution; that the first Wednesday in February next be the day for the electors to assemble in their respective States and vote for a President; and that the first Wednesday in March next be the time and the present seat of Congress the place for commencing proceedings under the said Constitution.

This is the short, concise, and legislative history of the creation of the new government which was to be constituted on "the first Wednesday in March next."

Due to delays caused by the late arrival of Representatives and Senators, a quorum was not completed in the House until April 1, 1789, and in the Senate on April 6. The proceedings of the Senate and the House of Representatives having reference to the counting of the electoral votes, the issuing of the certificate of election, the notification of the President and Vice President, the designation of the messengers who were to inform them of their respective elections, the naming of the committees of reception, the details of the taking of the oath and of inauguration, the respective addresses of the Vice President and the President, and the appropriate replies of the Senate and House of Representatives are set out below under the date headings of each happening.

The First Congress under the Constitution was meeting in Federal Hall. This was originally the old City Hall, in Wall Street, at the head of Broad Street, the present site of the Subtreasury of the United States. It had been practically rebuilt for the use of the First Congress. This building was first erected in 1700 at a cost of $20,000, and the sum of $32,500 was spent in remodeling it for the First Congress. The Stamp Act Congress of 1765 met in the building, and many of the sessions of the Continental Congress had also been held here. In its remodeled condition it was considered a very imposing structure.

The National Register, an old-time publication, describes it in part as follows:

The basement was Tuscan, pierced with seven openings, massive pillars in the center supporting four Doric columns and a pediment. The frieze was so divided as to admit 13 stars in metopes. These, with the American eagle and other insignia, the tablets over the windows filled with 13 arrows, and the olive branches united, were considered sufficient to mark it as a building designated for national purposes * * *. The Senate Chamber was 40 by 30 feet * * *. Three windows were placed in the front and back walls, those in front opening on an open gallery 12 feet deep, which overlooked Broad and Wall Streets.

It was upon this gallery that Washington stood when he took his oath of office as first President of the United States. The spot where he stood is now marked, as nearly as possible, by the colossal statute of the first President at the front of the subtreasury.

When Congress had completed its organization both Houses met in joint session to count the electoral votes cast in the several States a few weeks before for President and Vice President of the United States. It was found that George Washington had received 69 votes for President, the whole number cast, and that John Adams had received 34 votes for Vice President. Thirty-five votes were scattered among 10 others. When the counting of votes was finished the following certificate was issued:

Be it known that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, being convened in the city and State of New York the 6th day of April, in the year of our Lord 1789, the underwritten appointed President of the Senate for the sole purpose of receiving, opening, and counting the votes of electors, did, in the presence of the said Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and count all the votes of the electors for a President and for a Vice President, by which it appears that George Washington, Esq., was unanimously elected, agreeably to the Constitution, to the office of President of the United States of America.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal.

JOHN LANGDON.

A similar certificate was issued for the election of John Adams to the office of Vice President.

Charles Thomson, the greatly esteemed Secretary of the Continental Congress, was sent to carry the certificate of election to General Washington at Mount Vernon, and Sylvanus Bourne was sent on a like errand to Mr. Adams at Braintree, Mass. Both messengers set out on Tuesday, the 7th of April, and Mr. Bourne reached Braintree on the following Thursday evening. On the next Monday Mr. Adams started for New York, where he arrived in just a week. On the way he was received with "Federal honors" and escorted from town to town by military companies. He was inducted into office as Vice President of the United States on the 21st of April.

THE NOTIFICATION OF THE PRESIDENT-ELECT

Mr. Thomson, leaving New York on Tuesday morning April 7, reached Philadelphia Thursday evening, Baltimore Sunday evening, and arrived at Mount Vernon at half past 12 o'clock Tuesday afternoon. Thus he was more than 1 week making his journey.

Mr. Thomson formally presented to General Washington his certificate of election as President-elect in the following statment:

Sir, the President of the Senate, chosen for the special purpose, having opened and counted the votes of the electors in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, I was honored with the commands of the Senate to wait upon Your Excellency with the information of your being elected to the office of President of the United States of America. This commission was entrusted to me on account of my having been long in the confidence of the late Congress, and charged with the duties of one of the principal civil departments of the Government. I have now, sir, to inform you that the proofs you have given of your patriotism and your readiness to sacrifice domestic ease and private enjoyments to preserve the happiness of your country did not permit the two Houses to harbor a doubt of your undertaking this great and important office to which you are called, not only by the unanimous vote of the electors but by the voice of America.

I have it, therefore, in command to accompany you to New York, where the Senate and House of Representatives are convened for the dispatch of public business.

General Washington replied as follows:

I have been accustomed to pay so much respect to the opinion of my fellow citizens that the knowledge of their having given their unanimous suffrages in my favor scarcely leaves me the alternative for an option. I cannot, I believe, give a greater evidence of my sensibility of the honor which they have done me than by accepting the appointment.

I am so much affected by this fresh proof of my country's esteem and confidence that silence can best explain my gratitude. While I realize the arudous nature of the task which is imposed upon me, and feel my own inability to perform it, I wish, however, that there may not be reason for regretting the choice, for indeed all I can promise is only to accomplish that which can be done by an honest zeal.

Upon considering how long a time some of the gentlemen of both Houses of Congress have been at New York, how anxiously desirous they must be to proceed to business, and how deeply the public mind appears to be impressed with the necessity of doing it speedily, I cannot find myself at liberty to delay my journey. I shall therefore be in readiness to set out the day after tomorrow and shall be happy in the pleasure of your company, if you will permit me to say that it is a peculiar gratification to have received the communication from you.

About 10 o'clock I bade adieu to Mount Vernon, to private life, and to domestic felicity; and with a mind oppressed with more anxious and painful sensations than I have words to express, set out for New York in company with Mr. Thomson and Colonel Humphreys with the best disposition to render service to my country in obedience to its calls, but with less hope of answering its expectations.

The route of the party led through Alexandria, Va., Georgetown, Baltimore, Havre de Grace, and Elkton, Md., Wilmington, Del., Chester, and Philadelphia, Pa., Trenton, Princeton, New Brunswick, and Elizabeth, N. J. The coach was drawn by four horses. Leaving Chester, all three, General Washington, Colonel Humphreys, and Charles Thomson were mounted on beautiful horses.

In Alexandria there was a dinner at Wise's tavern; at Georgetown at Grant's tavern; in Baltimore at the Fountain Inn; in Philadelphia at the old City Tavern on Second and Walnut Streets, at this banquet 250 guests were present; in Princeton Washington spent the night with Dr. John Witherspoon, the retired president of the college, and near Elizabeth he took breakfast at the home of Elias Boudinot, another old friend.

What must have been his thoughts in Alexandria, in Chester, in Philadelphia, Trenton, and Princeton? Memories of early youth, of Brandywine, of Germantown, of Valley Forge, of the First Continental Congress, of the Constitutional Convention, of the crossing of the Delaware, of the battles of Trenton and Princeton, of the death of General Mercer. Memories of these and many others must have crowded into his mind. It was well that this was a journey filled with happiness and anticipation, to overcome the somber thoughts of battles, defeats, trials, and vicissitudes of other and earlier years.

Let us now turn to the proceedings and deliberations of the Senate and the House of Representatives as recorded in the Annals of Congress and see how the wheels of government were set in motion. This is the authoritative history of these proceedings, and therein we learn how wisely and well our legislative predecessors planned and executed this all-important event:

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF NEW YORK, MARCH 4, 1789

Monday, April 6

Richard Henry Lee, from Virginia, then appearing, took his seat, and formed a quorum of the whole Senators of the United States.

The credentials of the Members present being read and ordered to be filed, the Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of a President, for the sole purpose of opening and counting the votes for President of the United States.

John Langdon was elected.

Ordered, That Mr. Ellsworth inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to proceed, in the presence of the House, to discharge that duty; and that the Senate have appointed one of their Members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; submitting it to the wisdom of the House to appoint one or more of their Members for the like purpose.

Mr. Ellsworth reported that he had delivered the message; and Mr. Boudinot, from the House of Representatives, informed the Senate that the House is ready forthwith to meet them, to attend the opening and counting of the votes of the electors of the President and Vice President of the United States.

The Speaker and the Members of the House of Representatives attended in the Senate Chamber; and the President elected for the purpose of counting the votes declared that the Senate and House of Representatives had met, and that he, in their presence, had opened and counted the votes of the electors for President and Vice President of the United States, which were as follows:

The result of the vote

Whereby it appeared that George Washington, Esq., was elected President, and John Adams, Esq., Vice President, of the United States of America.

Mr. Madison, from the House of Representatives, thus addressed the Senate:

"Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that the House have agreed that the notifications of the election of the President and of the Vice President of the United States should be made by such persons and in such manner as the Senate shall be pleased to direct."

And he withdrew.

Whereupon the Senate appointed Charles Thomson, Esq., to notify George Washington, Esq., of his election to the office of President of the United States of America, and Mr. Sylvanus Bourne to notify John Adams, Esq., of his election to the office of Vice President of the said United States.

A letter was received from James Duane, Esq., enclosing resolutions of the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York tendering to Congress the use of the city hall.

James Mathews was elected Doorkeeper.

The committee to whom it was referred to consider of and report respecting the ceremonial of receiving the President, and the arrangements necessary for the reception of the Vice President, agreed to the following report, viz:

"That Mr. Osgood, the proprietor of the house lately occupied by the President of Congress, be requested to put the same and the furniture thereof in proper condition for the residence and use of the President of the United States, and otherwise, at the expense of the United States, to provide for his temporary accommodation.

"That it will be more eligible, in the first instance, that a committee of three Members from the Senate and five Members from the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the two Houses, respectively, attend to receive the President, at such place as he shall embark from New Jersey to this city, and conduct him, without form, to the house lately occupied by the President of Congress; and that, at such time thereafter as the President shall signify it will be most convenient for him, he be formally received by both Houses.

"That a committee of two Members from the Senate and three Members from the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Houses, respectively, wait on the Vice President of the United States, as soon as he shall come to this city, and, in the name of the Congress of the United States, congratulate him on his arrival."

Which report was read and accepted.

Thursday, April 16

The Senate proceeded by ballot to the choice of the committees, conformably to the report of the committee of both Houses, agreed to on the 15th instant. Mr. Langdon, Mr. Carroll, and Mr. Johnson were appointed to wait on the President, and Mr. Ellsworth and Mr. Dalton were appointed to wait on the Vice President.

Monday, April 20

Messrs. Strong and Izard were appointed a committee to wait on the Vice President and conduct him to the Senate Chamber.

THE VICE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS

Tuesday, April 21

The committee appointed to conduct the Vice President to the Senate Chamber executed their commission, and Mr. Langdon, the Vice President pro tempore, meeting the Vice President on the floor of the Senate Chamber, addressed him as follows:

"Sir, I have it in charge from the Senate to introduce you to the Chair of this House, and also to congratulate you on your appointment to the office of Vice President of the United States of America."

After which Mr. Langdon conducted the Vice President to the chair, when the Vice President addressed the Senate as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Senate, invited to this respectable situation by the suffrages of our fellow citizens, according to the Constitution, I have thought it my duty cheerfully and readily to accept it. Unaccustomed to refuse any public service, however dangerous to my reputation or disproportioned to my talents, it would have been inconsistent to have adopted another maxim of conduct at this time, when the prosperity of the country and the liberties of the people require, perhaps, as much as ever the attention of those who possess any share of the public confidence.

"I should be destitute of sensibility if, upon my arrival in this city and presentation to this Legislature, and especially to this Senate, I could see, without emotion, so many of those characters, of whose virtuous exertions I have so often been a witness—from whose countenances and examples I have ever derived encouragement and animation; whose disinterested friendship has supported me in many intricate conjunctures of public affairs, at home and abroad; whose celebrated defenders of the liberties of this country, whom menaces could not intimidate, corruption seduce, or flattery allure; those intrepid assertors of the rights of mankind, whose philosophy and policy have enlightened the world, in 20 years, more than it was ever before enlightened in many centuries, by ancient schools, or modern universities.

"I must have been inattentive to the course of events if I were either ignorant of the fame or insensible to the merit of those other characters in the Senate to whom it has been my misfortune to have been hitherto personally unknown.

"It is with satisfaction that I congratulate the people of America on the formation of a National Constitution, and the fair prospect of a consistent administration of a government of laws; on the acquisition of a House of Representatives, chosen by themselves; of a Senate thus composed by their own State legislatures; and on the prospect of an Executive authority, in the hands of one whose portrait I shall not presume to draw. Were I blessed with powers to do justice to his character, it would be impossible to increase the confidence or affection of his country or make the smallest addition to his glory. This can only be effected by a discharge of the present exalted trust on the same principles, with the same abilities and virtues, which have uniformly appeared in all his former conduct, public or private. May I, nevertheless, be indulged to inquire, if we look over the catalog of the first magistrates of nations, whether they have been denominated presidents or consuls, kings or princes, where shall we find one, whose commanding talents and virtues, whose overruling good fortune have so completely united all hearts and voices in his favor, who enjoyed the esteem and admiration of foreign nations and fellow citizens with equal unanimity? Qualities so uncommon are no common blessings to the country that possesses them. By those great qualities, and their benign effects, has Providence marked out the head of this Nation, with a hand so distinctly visible as to have been seen by all men and mistaken by none.

"It is not for me to interrupt your deliberations by any general observations on the state of the Nation, or by recommending or proposing any particular measure. It would be superfluous, to gentlemen of your great experience, to urge the necessity of order. It is only necessary to make an apology for myself. Not wholly without experience in public assemblies, I have been more accustomed to take a share in their debates than to preside in their deliberations. It shall be my constant endeavor to behave toward every member of this most honorable body with all that consideration, delicacy, and decorum, which becomes the dignity of his station and character; but if, from inexperience or inadvertency, anything should ever escape me inconsistent with propriety, I must entreat you, by imputing it to its true cause, and not to any want of respect, to pardon and excuse it.

"A trust of the greatest magnitude is committed to this legislature; and the eyes of the world are upon you. Your country expects, from the results of your deliberations, in concurrence with the other branches of government, consideration abroad, and contentment at home—prosperity, order, justice, peace, and liberty. And may God Almighty's Providence assist you to answer their just expectations."

On motion,

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members, be appointed to consider and report what style or titles it will be proper to annex to the offices of President and Vice President of the United States, if any other than those given in the Constitution. Also to consider of the time, place, and manner in which, and the person by whom, the oath prescribed by the Constitution shall be administered to the President; and to confer thereon with such committee as the House of Representatives shall appoint for that purpose. (Mr. Lee, Mr. Izard, and Mr. Dalton were chosen.)

Friday, April 24

On motion, to reconsider the commission of the committee appointed the 23d instant to report what titles shall be annexed to the offices of President and Vice President. Passed in the affirmative.

On motion that the following words, "What titles it will be proper to annex to the offices of President and of Vice President of the United States, if any other than those given in the Constitution," be struck out. Passed in the negative.

On motion, that the words "style or" before the word "title" be added. Passed in the affirmative.

Saturday, April 25

The Right Reverend Samuel Provost was elected Chaplain.

A letter from Charles Thomson, Esq., dated the 24th of April 1789, directed to the President of the Senate, purporting his having delivered to General Washington the certificate of his being elected President of the United States, was read and ordered to be filed.

The committee appointed to consider of the time, place, and manner in which, and of the person by whom, the oath prescribed by the Constitution shall be administered to the President of the United States, and to confer with a committee of the House appointed for that purpose, report:

That the President hath been pleased to signify to them that any time or place which both Houses may think proper to appoint and any manner which shall appear most eligible to them will be convenient and acceptable to him; that requisite preparations cannot probably be made before Thursday next; that the President be on that day formally received by both Houses in the Senate Chamber; that the Representatives' Chamber being capable of receiving the greater number of persons, that, therefore, the President do take the oath in that place and in the presence of both Houses.

That, after the formal reception of the President in the Senate Chamber, he be attended by both Houses to the Representatives' Chamber and that the oath be administered by the chancelor of the State of New York.

The committee further report it as their opinion that it will be proper that a committee of both Houses be appointed to take order for conducting the business.

Read and accepted.

Whereupon Mr. Lee, Mr. Izard, and Mr. Dalton, on the part of the Senate, together with a committee that may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, were empowered to take order for conducting the business.

An order of the House of Representatives, concurring in the appointment of a committee on their part to confer with a committee appointed on the 24th instant, on the part of the Senate, to consider and report, "what style, etc., it will be proper to annex to the offices of President and Vice President," was read, by which it appears that Mr. Benson, Mr. Ames, Mr. Madison, Mr. Carroll, and Mr. Sherman were appointed on the part of the House.

Monday, April 27

The committee appointed to take order for conducting the ceremonial of the formal reception, etc., of the President, reported:

That it appears to them more eligible that the oath should be administered to the President in the outer gallery adjoining the Senate Chamber, than in the Representatives' Chamber, and, therefore, submit to the respective Houses the propriety of authorizing their committee to take order as to the place where the oath shall be administered to the President, the resolution of Saturday assigning the Representatives' Chamber as the place, notwithstanding. (Read and accepted.)

Resolved, That, after the oath shall have been administered to to the President, he, attended by the Vice President, and Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, proceed to St. Paul's Chapel, to hear divine service, to be performed by the Chaplain of Congress already appointed. (Sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.)

Tuesday, April 28

Received, from the House of Representatives, the report of a joint committee on the ceremonial to be observed in administering the oath, etc., to the President; and a bill to regulate the time and manner of administering certain oaths. The report was read and ordered to lie on the table; and the bill received its first reading.

The committee appointed to report a mode of communication between the two Houses with respect to papers, bills, etc., and to whom the subject was recommitted, having again conferred with the committee of the House of Representatives, agreed upon a report, which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

* * * * * * *

Thursday, April 30

The report of the committee on the mode of communication between the Senate and House of Representatives was taken up, and after debate postponed.

Mr. Lee, in behalf of the committee appointed to take order for conducting the ceremonial of the formal reception, etc., of the President of the United States, having informed the Senate that the same was adjusted, the House of Representatives were notified that the Senate were ready to receive them in the Senate Chamber, to attend the President of the United States while taking the oath required by the Constitution. Whereupon, the House of Representatives, preceded by their Speaker, came into the Senate Chamber and took the seats assigned them, and the joint committee, preceded by their chairman, agreeably to order, introduced the President of the United States to the Senate Chamber, where he was received by the Vice President, who conducted him to the chair, when the Vice President informed him that "the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States were ready to attend him to take the oath required by the Constitution, and that it would be administered by the chancelor of the State of New York"; to which the President replied he was ready to proceed; and being attended to the gallery in front of the Senate Chamber by the Vice President and Senators, the Speaker and Representatives, and the other public characters present, the oath was administered. After which the chancelor proclaimed, "Long live George Washington, President of the United States!"

The President, having returned to his seat, after a short pause, arose and addressed the Senate and House of Representatives as follows:

THE FIRST INAUGURAL ADDRESS

"Fellow citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, among the vicissitudes incident to life, no event could have filled me with greater anxieties than that of which the notification was transmitted by your order and received on the 14th day of the present month. On the one hand I was summoned by my country, whose voice I can never hear but with veneration and love, from a retreat which I had chosen with the fondest predilection, and in my flattering hopes, with an immutable decision, as the asylum of my declining years; a retreat which was rendered every day more necessary, as well as more dear to me by the addition of habit to inclination, and of frequent interruptions in my health, to the gradual waste committed on it by time. On the other hand, the magnitude and difficulty of the trust to which the voice of my country called me, being sufficient to awaken in the wisest and most experienced of her citizens a distrustful scrutiny into his qualifications, could not but overwhelm with despondence one who, inheriting inferior endowments from Nature, and unpractised in the duties of civil administration, ought to be peculiarly conscious of his own deficiencies. In this conflict of emotions, all I dare aver is that it has been my faithful study to collect my duty from a just appreciation of every circumstance by which it might be affected. All I dare hope is, that if in executing this task I have been too much swayed by a grateful remembrance of former instances, or by an affectionate sensibility to this transcendent proof of the confidence of my fellow citizens, and have thence too little consulted my incapacity as well as disinclination for the weighty and untried cares before me, my error will be palliated by the motives which misled me, and its consequences be judged by my country, with some share of the partiality in which they originated.

"Such being the impressions under which I have, in obedience to the public summons, repaired to the present station, it would be peculiarly improper to omit in this first official act my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being who rules over the universe—who presides in the councils of nations, and whose providential aids can supply every human defect, that his benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a government instituted by themselves for these essential purposes, and may enable every instrument employed in its administration to execute with success the functions allotted to his charge. In tendering this homage to the great Author of every public and private good, I assure myself that it expresses your sentiments not less than my own; nor those of my fellow citizens at large less than either. No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand which conducts the affairs of men more than the people of the United States. Every step by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency; and in the important revolution just accomplished in the system of their united government, the tranquil deliberations and voluntary consent of so many distinct communities from which the event has resulted, cannot be compared with the means by which most governments have been established without some return of pious gratitude, along with an humble anticipation of the future blessings which the past seems to presage. These reflections, arising out of the present crisis, have forced themselves too strongly on my mind to be suppressed. You will join with me, I trust, in thinking that there are none under the influence of which the proceedings of a new and free government can more auspiciously commence.

"By the article establishing the executive department it is made the duty of the President 'to recommend to your consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.' The circumstances under which I now meet you will acquit me from entering into that subject, further than to refer to the great constitutional charter under which you are assembled, and which, in defining your powers, designates the objects to which your attention is to be given. It will be more consistent with those circumstances, and for more congenial with the feelings which actuate me, to substitute, in place of a recommendation of particular measures, the tribute that is due to the talents, the rectitude, and the patriotism which adorn the characters selected to devise and adopt them. In these honorable qualifications I behold the surest pledges that as, on the one side, no local prejudices or attachments, no separate views, nor party animosities, will misdirect the comprehensive and equal eye which ought to watch over this great assemblage of communities and interests; so, on another, that the foundations of our national policy will be laid in the pure and immutable principles of private morality, and the preeminence of free government be exemplified by all the attributes which can win the effections of its citizens and command the respect of the world. I dwell on this prospect with every satisfaction which an ardent love for my country can inspire; since there is no truth more thoroughly established than that there exists in the economy and course of nature an indissoluble union between virtue and happiness—between duty and advantage—between the genuine maxims of an honest and magnanimous policy and the solid rewards of public prosperity and felicity; since we ought to be no less persuaded that the propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right which Heaven itself has ordained; and since the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government are justly considered as deeply, perhaps as finally, staked on the experiment entrusted to the hands of the American people.

"Besides the ordinary objects submitted to your care, it will remain with your judgment to decide how far an exercise of the occasional power delegated by the fifth article of the Constitution is rendered expedient at the present juncture, by the nature of objections which have been urged against the system, or by the degree of inquietude which has given birth to them. Instead of undertaking particular recommendations on this subject, in which I could be guided by no lights derived from official opportunities, I shall again give way to my entire confidence in your discernment and pursuit of the public good. For I assure myself that while you carefully avoid every alteration which might endanger the benefits of a united and effective government, or which ought to await the future lessons of experience, a reverence for the characteristic rights of freemen, and a regard for the public harmony, will sufficiently influence your deliberations on the question how far the former can be more impregnably fortified or the latter be safely and advantageously promoted.

"To the preceding observations I have one to add, which will be most properly addressed to the House of Representatives. It concerns myself, and will, therefore, be as brief as possible. When I was first honored with a call into the service of my country, then on the eve of an arduous struggle for its liberties, the light in which I contemplated by duty required that I should renounce every pecuniary compensation. From this resolution I have in no instance departed; and being still under the impressions which produced it, I must decline, as inapplicable to myself, any share in the personal emoluments which may be indispensably included in a permanent provision for the executive department; and must accordingly pray that the pecuniary estimates for the station in which I am placed may, during my continuance in it, be limited to such actual expenditures as the public good may be thought to require.

"Having thus imparted to you my sentiments, as they have been awakened by the occasion which brings us together, I shall take my present leave; but not without resorting once more to the benign Parent of the human race in humble supplication that, since He has been pleased to favor the American people with opportunities for deliberating in perfect tranquility, and dispositions for deciding, with unparalleled unanimity, on a form of government for the security of their Union and the advancement of their happiness, so His divine blessing may be equally conspicuous in the enlarged views, the temperate consultations, and the wise measures on which the success of this Government must depend.

"G. WASHINGTON."

THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS ATTEND DIVINE SERVICE

The President, the Vice President, the Senate, and House of Representatives, etc., then proceeded to St. Paul's Chapel, where divine service was performed by the Chaplain of Congress, after which the President was reconducted to his house by the committee appointed for that purpose.

The Vice President and Senate returned to the Senate Chamber; and,

Upon motion, unanimously agreed, that a committee of three should be appointed to prepare an answer to the President's speech. Mr. Johnson, Mr. Paterson, and Mr. Carroll were elected.

* * * * * * *

THE REPLY OF THE SENATE

The committee appointed to prepare an answer to the President's speech, delivered to the Senate and House of Representatives reported as follows:

"SIR: We, the Senate of the United States, return you our sincere thanks for your excellent speech delivered to both Houses of Congress; congratulate you on the complete organization of the Federal Government; and felicitate ourselves and our fellow citizens on your elevation to the office of President, an office highly important by the powers constitutionally annexed to it and extremely honorable from the manner in which the appointment is made. The unanimous suffrage of the elective body in your favor is peculiarly expressive of the gratitude, confidence, and affection of the citizens of America, and is the highest testimonial at once of your merit and their esteem. We are sensible, sir, that nothing but the voice of your fellow citizens could have called you from a retreat chosen with the fondest predilection, endeared by habit, and consecrated to the repose of declining years. We rejoice, and with us all America, that, in obedience to the call of our common country, you have returned once more to public life. In you all parties confide; in you all interests unite; and we have no doubt that your past services, great as they have been, will be equaled by your future exertions; and that your prudence and sagacity as a statesman will tend to avert the dangers to which we are exposed, to give stability to the present Government, and dignity and splendor to that country which your skill and valor as a soldier so eminently contributed to raise to independence and empire.

"When we contemplate the coincidence of circumstances, and wonderful combination of causes, which gradually prepared the people of this country for independence; when we contemplate the rise, progress, and termination of the late war, which gave them a name among the nations of the earth; we are, with you, unavoidably led to acknowledge and adore the great Arbiter of the universe, by whom empires rise and fall. A review of the many signal instances of divine interposition in favor of this country, claims our most pious gratitude; and permits us, sir, to observe that, among the great events which have led to the formation and establishment of a Federal Government, we esteem your acceptance of the office of President as one of the most propitious and important.

"In the execution of the trust reposed in us, we shall endeavor to pursue that enlarged and liberal policy to which your speech so happily directs. We are conscious that the prosperity of each State is inseparably connected with the welfare of all, and that, in promoting the latter, we shall effectually advance the former. In full persuasion of this truth, it shall be our invariable aim to divest ourselves of local prejudices and attachments, and to view the great assemblage of communities and interests committed to our charge with an equal eye. We feel, sir, the force and acknowledge the justice of the observation, that the foundation of our national policy should be laid in private morality. If individuals be not influenced by moral principles, it is in vain to look for public virtue; it is, therefore, the duty of legislators to enforce, both by precept and example, the utility, as well as the necessity, of a strict adherence to the rules of distributive justice. We beg you to be assured that the Senate will, at all times, cheerfully cooperate in every measure which may strengthen the Union, conduce to the happiness, or secure and perpetuate the liberties of this great confederated Republic.

"We commend you, sir, to the protection of Almighty God, earnestly beseeching Him long to preserve a life so valuable and dear to the people of the United States; and that your administration may be prosperous to the Nation, and glorious to yourself."

Read and accepted; and Ordered, That the Vice President should affix his signature to the address, in behalf of the Senate.

* * * * * * *

Thursday, May 14

* * * * * * *

The committee, appointed the 9th instant, to determine "under what title it will be proper for the Senate to address the President," and to confer with a committee of the House of Representatives "upon the disagreeing votes of the Senate and House," informed the Senate that they had conferred with a committee of the House of Representatives but could not agree upon a report.

The committee, appointed the 9th instant, "to consider and report under what title it will be proper for the Senate to address the President of the United States of America," reported:

"That, in the opinion of the committee, it will be proper thus to address the President: His Highness, the President of the United States of America, and Protector of their Liberties."

Which report was postponed, and the following resolve was agreed to, to wit:

"From a decent respect for the opinion and practice of civilized nations, whether under monarchial or republican forms of government, whose custom is to annex titles of respectability to the office of their chief magistrate; and that, on intercourse with foreign nations, a due respect for the majesty of the people of the United States may not be hazarded by any appearance of singularity, the Senate have been induced to be of opinion that it would be proper to annex a respectible title to the office of the President of the United States; but the Senate, desirous of preserving harmony with the House of Representatives, where the practice lately observed in presenting an address to the President was without the addition of titles, think it proper for the present to act in conformity with the practice of that House: Therefore

"Resolved, That the present address be 'To the President of the United States,' without addition of title."

Monday, May 18

THE REPLY OF THE PRESIDENT

Agreeably to the order of the 15th instant, the Senate waited on the President of the United States at his own house, when the Vice President, in their name, delivered to the President the address agreed to on the 7th instant, to which the President of the United States was pleased to make the following reply:

"Gentlemen, I thank you for your address, in which the most affectionate sentiments are expressed in the most obliging terms. The coincidence of circumstances which led to this auspicious crisis, the confidence reposed in me by my fellow citizens, and the assistance I may expect from counsels which will be dictated by an enlarged and liberal policy, seem to presage a more prosperous issue to my administration than a diffidence of my abilities had taught me to anticipate. I now feel myself inexpressibly happy in a belief that Heaven, which has done so much for our infant Nation, will not withdraw its providential influence before our political felicity shall have been completed, and in a conviction that the Senate will at all times cooperate in every measure which may tend to promote the welfare of this confederated Republic. Thus supported by a firm trust in the great Arbiter of the universe, aided by the collective wisdom of the Union, and imploring the divine benediction on our joint exertions in the service of our country, I readily engage with you in the arduous but pleasing task of attempting to make a nation happy.

"G. WASHINGTON."

PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIRST CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF NEW YORK, MARCH 4, 1789

* * * * * * *

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Ellsworth:

"Mr. Speaker, I am charged by the Senate to inform this House that a quorum of the Senate is now formed; that a President is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates and counting the votes of the electors of the several States in a choice of a President and Vice President of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready in the Senate Chamber to proceed, in presence of this House, to discharge that duty. I have it also in further charge to inform this House that the Senate has appointed one of its Members to sit at the Clerk's table to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared, submitting it to the wisdom of this House to appoint one or more of its Members for the like purpose."

On motion,

Resolved, That Mr. Speaker, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate; and that Mr. Parker and Mr. Heister be appointed, on the part of this House, to sit at the Clerk's table with the Member of the Senate and make a list of the votes as the same shall be declared.

Mr. Speaker accordingly left the chair, and, attended by the House, withdrew to the Senate Chamber, and after some time returned to the House.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. Parker and Mr. Heister then delivered in at the Clerk's table a list of the votes of the electors of the several States in the choice of a President and Vice President of the United States, as the same were declared by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and of this House, which was ordered to be entered on the Journal.

On motion,

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that it is the desire of this House that the notifications of the election of the President and Vice President of the United States should be made by such persons and in such manner as the Senate shall be pleased to direct, and that Mr. Madison do communicate the said message.

* * * * * * *

On motion,

Ordered, That Mr. Benson, Mr. Peter Muhlenburg, and Mr. Griffin be a committee to consider of and report to the House respecting the ceremonial of receiving the President, and that they be authorized to confer with a committee of the Senate for the purpose.

* * * * * * *

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Honorable John Langdon, a Member of the Senate, communicating an instruction to a committee of that House to report, if any, and what, arrangements are necessary for the reception of the Vice President, which was read.

Ordered, That the said letter be referred to the committee appointed to consider of, and report to the House, respecting the ceremonial of receiving the President; and that it be an instruction to the said committee to report upon the said letter also.

Wednesday, April 15

* * * * * * *

Mr. Benson, from the committee to whom it was referred to consider of and report to the House respecting the ceremonial of receiving the President, and to whom was also referred a letter from the chairman of a committee of the Senate to the Speaker, communicating an instruction from that House to a committee thereof, to report, if any, and what, arrangements are necessary for the reception of the President, made the following report:

"That Mr. Osgood, the proprietor of the house lately occupied by the President of Congress, be requested to put the same, and the furniture therein, in proper condition for the residence and use of the President of the United States, to provide for his temporary accommodation.

"That it will be most eligible, in the first instance, that a committee of three Members from the Senate and five from the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Houses respectively, to attend to receive the President at such place as he shall embark from New Jersey for this city, and conduct him without form to the house lately occupied by the President of Congress, and that at such time thereafter as the President shall signify it will be convenient for him, he be formally received by both Houses.

"That a committee of two Members from the Senate and three Members from the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Houses respectively, wait on the President of the United States as soon as he shall come to this city, and, in the name of the Congress of the United States, congratulate him on his arrival."

And a committee of five was balloted for and chosen accordingly for the purpose of waiting on the President.

Another committee of three was appointed to wait on the Vice President.

Thursday, April 16

* * * * * * *

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a committee of five, to attend, with a committee from the Senate, to receive the President of the United States at such place as he shall embark at from New Jersey for this city.

The members elected were Messrs. Boudinot, Bland, Tucker, Benson, and Lawrence.

On motion,

Ordered, That Messrs. Gilman, Ames, and Gale, be a committee, in conjunction with a committee from the Senate, to wait upon the Vice President of the United States upon his arrival in this city, and to congratulate him thereupon in the name of the Congress of the United States.

* * * * * * *

Friday, April 24

Mr. Boudinot reported, from the committee appointed to attend with a committee from the Senate, to receive the President of the United States, at the place of his embarkation from New Jersey, that the committee did, according to order, together with a committee from the Senate, attend at Elizabethtown, in New Jersey, on the 23rd instant, at which place the two committees met the President, and thence embarked for this city, where they arrived about 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, and conducted him to the house appointed for his residence.

* * * * * * *

Saturday, April 25

The House, according to the order of the day, received the report from the Committee of the whole House, to the bill to regulate the taking the oath or affirmation prescribed by the sixth article of the Constitution; and the amendments to the said bill being read and amended at the Clerk's table, were agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. Benson, from the committee appointed to consider of the time, place, and manner in which, and of the person by whom the oath prescribed by the Constitution shall be administered to the President of the United States, and to confer with a committee of the Senate for the purpose, reported as followeth:

"That the President hath been pleased to signify to them that any time or place which both Houses may think proper to appoint and any manner which shall appear most eligible to them will be acceptable to him; that requisite preparations cannot probably be made before Thursday next; that the President be on that day formally received by both Houses in the Senate Chamber; that the Representatives' Chamber being capable of receiving the greater number of persons, that therefore the President do take the oath in that place, and in the presence of both Houses; that after the formal reception of the President in the Senate Chamber he be attended by both Houses to the Representatives' Chamber, and that the oath be administered by the chancellor of this State.

"The committee further report it as their opinion, that it will be proper that a committee of both Houses be appointed to take order for further conducting the ceremonial."

The said report was twice read; and, on the question put thereon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That Messrs. Benson, Ames, and Carroll be a committee on the part of this House, pursuant to the said report.

* * * * * * *

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Vice President of the United States, enclosing certain proceedings of the Senate, touching the ceremonial of the formal reception of the President of the United States, by both Houses, which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Benson, from the committee of both Houses, appointed to take order for conducting the ceremonial of the formal reception of the President of the United States, reported as followeth:

"That it appears to the committee more eligible that the oath should be administered to the President in the outer gallery adjoining the Senate Chamber than in the Representatives' Chamber, and therefore submit to the respective Houses the propriety of authorizing their committees to take order as to the place where the oath shall be administered to the President, the resolutions of Saturday, assigning the Representatives' Chamber as the place, notwithstanding."

The said report being twice read,

Resolved, That this House doth concur in the said report, and authorize the committee to take order for the change of place thereby proposed.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Vice President of the United States, enclosing two orders of the Senate, one of the 13th instant, appointing a committee to confer with any committee to be appointed on the part of this House, respecting the future disposition of the papers, etc., in the office of the late Secretary of the United States; the other of the 27th instant, for the attendance of both Houses, with the President of the United States, after the oath shall be administered to him, to hear divine service at St. Paul's Chapel, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Wednesday, April 29

* * * * * * *

The House proceeded to consider the following resolution of the Senate, to wit:

IN SENATE, April 27.

"Resolved, That after the oath shall have been administered to the President, he, attended by the Vice President and the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, proceed to St. Paul's Chapel to hear divine service, to be performed by the Chaplains to Congress already appointed."

Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth concur with the Senate in the said resolution, amended to read as followeth, to wit:

"That after the oath shall have been administered to the President, the Vice President, and Members of the Senate, the Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives will accompany him to St. Paul's Chapel to hear divine service performed by the Chaplains of Congress."

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate and desire their concurrence. (Adjourned.)

* * * * * * *

This being the day on which the President of the United States was inaugurated, no other business, of course, was attended to. The President's address to both Houses appears in the proceedings of the Senate, page 27.

Friday, May 1

The Speaker laid before the House a copy of the speech of the President of the United States to both Houses of Congress, delivered yesterday in the Senate Chamber immediately after his inauguration, which, being read,

On motion,

Resolved, That the said speech be committed to a committee of the whole House.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Page in the chair. And, after adopting the following resolution, the committee rose and reported it to the House, which agreed to it.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that an address to the President ought to be prepared, expressing the congratulations of the House of Representatives, on the distinguished proof given him of the affection and confidence of his fellow citizens, by the unanimous suffrage which has appointed him to the high station which he fills; the approbation felt by the House of the patriotic sentiments and enlightened policy recommended by his speech, and assuring him of their disposition to concur in giving effect to every measure which may tend to secure the liberties, promote the harmony, and advance the happiness and prosperity of their country.

Ordered, That a committee to consist of five members be appointed to prepare an address pursuant to the said resolution. The members elected are Messrs. Madison, Clymer, Sherman, Gale and Benson.

A motion was made that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That ——— per annum be the compensation to be allowed to the President of the United States during the term for which he is to be elected.

The said resolution being read, was committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The House then proceeded by ballot to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress on the part of this House. Upon examining the ballots it appeared that the Reverend William Linn was elected.

THE REPLY OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Madison, from the committee appointed to prepare an address on the part of this House to the President of the United States, in answer to his speech, to both Houses of Congress, reported as followeth:

The address of the House of Representatives to George Washington, President of the United States:

"Sir, the Representatives of the people of the United States present their congratulations on the event by which your fellow citizens have attested the preeminence of your merit. You have long held the first place in their esteem. You have often received tokens of their affection. You now possess the only proof that remained of their gratitude for your services, of their reverence for your wisdom, and of their confidence in your virtues. You enjoy the highest, because the truest honor, of being the first magistrate, by the unanimous choice of the freest people on the face of the earth.

"We well know the anxieties with which you must have obeyed a summons from the repose reserved for your declining years into public scenes, of which you had taken your leave forever. But the obedience was due to the occasion. It is already applauded by the universal joy which welcomes you to your station. And we cannot doubt that it will be rewarded with all the satisfaction with which an ardent love for your fellow citizens must review successful efforts to promote their happiness.

"This anticipation is not justified merely by the past experience of your signal services. It is particularly suggested by the pious impressions under which you mean to commence your administration and the enlightened maxims by which you mean to conduct it. We feel with you the strongest obligations to adore the invisible hand which has led the American people through so many difficulties to cherish a conscious responsibility for the destiny of republican liberty and to seek the only sure means of preserving and recommending the precious deposit in a system of legislation founded on the principles of an honest policy and directed by the spirit of a diffusive patriotism.

"The question arising out of the fifth article of the Constitution will receive all the attention demanded by its importance and will, we trust, be decided under the influence of all the considerations to which you allude.

"In forming the pecuniary provisions for the executive department we shall not lose sight of a wish resulting from motives which give it a peculiar claim to our regard. Your resolution, in a moment critical to the liberties of your country, to renounce all personal emolument, was among the many presages of your patriotic services, which have been amply fulfilled; and your scrupulous adherence now to the law then imposed on yourself cannot fail to demonstrate the purity, whilst it increases the luster of a character which has so many titles to admiration.

"Such are the sentiments which we have thought fit to address to you. They flow from our own hearts, and we verily believe that, among the millions we represent, there is not a virtuous citizen whose heart will disown them.

"All that remains is that we join in your fervent supplications for the blessings of Heaven on our country, and that we add our own for the choicest of these blessings on the most beloved of our citizens."

Said address was committed to a committee of the whole; and the House immediately resolved itself into a committee, Mr. Page in the chair. The Committee, proposing no amendment thereto, rose and reported the address; and the House agreed to it, and resolved that the Speaker, attended by the Members of this House, do present the said address to the President.

Ordered, That Messrs. Sinnickson, Coles, and Smith of South Carolina be a committee to wait on the President, to know when it will be convenient for him to receive the same.

* * * * * * *

Thursday, May 7

Mr. Smith of South Carolina from the committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, to know when it will be convenient for him to receive the address of this House, reported:

That the committee had, according to order, waited on the President, and that he signified to them that it would be convenient to him to receive the said address at 12 o'clock on Friday, at such place as the House shall be pleased to appoint. Whereupon,

Resolved, That as the chamber designed for the President's receiving the respective Houses is not yet prepared, this House will wait on the President to present their address in the room adjacent to the Representatives' Chamber.

On motion,

Resolved, That a committee of three Members be appointed to confer with any committee to be appointed on the part of the Senate, in preparing and reporting joint rules to be established between the two Houses for the enrollment, attestation, publication, and preservation of the acts of Congress; as also on the mode of presenting addresses, bills, votes, or resolutions to the President of the United States.

The Members appointed were Mr. Bland, Mr. Trumbull, and Mr. Vining. * * *

THE REPLY OF THE PRESIDENT TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The Speaker, attended by the Members of the House, withdrew to the room adjoining the Representatives' Chamber, and there presented to the President of the United States the address agreed to on Tuesday last, to which he returned the following answer:

"GENTLEMEN: Your very affectionate address produces emotions which I know not how to express. I feel that my past endeavors in the service of my country are far overpaid by its goodness; and I fear much that my future ones may not fulfill your kind anticipation. All that I can promise is, that they will be invariably directed by an honest and ardent zeal. Of this resource my heart assures me. For all beyond I rely on the wisdom and patriotism of those with whom I am to cooperate and a continuance of the blessings of Heaven on our beloved country."

The Speaker and Members being returned into the House.

THE INAUGURATION CEREMONIES

Thursday, April 30

The inaugural ceremonies began at sunrise by the firing of a national salute from old Fort George, near Bowling Green. Beginning at 9 o'clock the bells of all the churches rang for half an hour. People gathered in the churches "to implore the blessing of Heaven on the new Government, its favor and protection to the President, and success and acceptance to his administration."

The parade formed and the procession was led by Col. Morgan Lewis as grand marshal; he was attended by Major Van Horne and Maj. Jacob Morton as aides-de-camp. A troup of mounted officers led the way, followed by the artillery, two companies of grenadiers, a company of light infantry led by Majors Bricker and Chrystie; next came a regiment of Scotch Highlanders in full uniform. The sheriff of New York, Robert Boyd, rode alone on horseback, and in line with him came the Senate committee, John Langdon, Charles Carroll, and William Samuel Johnson. Next came a number of "assistants," Gen. Samuel B. Webb; Col. William S. Smith; Lt. Col. Nicholas Fish; Lieutenant Colonel Franks; Maj. Leonard Bleecher; and Mr. John R. Livingston, brother of Chancelor Livingston.

The President-elect came next in a coach of state, drawn by four white horses, he was accompanied by Col. David Humphreys and Tobias Lear, his private secretary. Then came the committee from the House of Representatives, and Richard Henry Lee, Ralph Izard, and Tristram Dalton. The French Minister, Comte de Moustier, and the Spanish Minister, Don Diego Gardoqui, rode in their own carriages. The rear was brought up by a long line of distinguished citizens.

The parade reached Federal Hall about 1 p. m. It halted about 200 yards from the hall, and through a line drawn up on either side, General Washington, accompanied by those especially invited, passed into the Senate Chamber. The Federal Hall, the windows of all the houses in the neighborhood, and the roofs of the surrounding buildings had been crowded since early morning.

The Senate had met about 11 o'clock, and what therein transpired is told herein in the words of William Maclay, one of the Senators from Pennsylvania:

"Thursday, 30th April. This is a great, important day. Goddess of Etiquette, assist me while I describe it. The Senate stood adjourned to half after eleven o'clock. About 10, dressed in my best clothes. Went for Mr. Morris' lodgings, but met his son, who told me that his father would not be in town until Saturday. About 10, turned into the hall. The crowd already great. The Senate met. The President [Mr. Adams] rose in the most solemn manner:

" 'GENTLEMEN: I wish for the direction of the Senate. The President will, I suppose, address the Congress. How shall I behave? How shall we receive it? Shall it be standing or sitting?' "

* * * * * * *

"But all at once the Secretary, who had been out, whispered to the Chair that the Clerk from the Representatives was at the door with a communication. Gentlemen of the Senate, how shall he be received? A silly kind of resolution of the committee on that business had been laid on the table some days ago. The amount of it was, that each House should communicate to the other what and how they chose. It concluded, however, something in this way—that everything should be done with all the propriety that was proper. The question was, Shall this be adopted, that we may know how to receive the Clerk? It was objected; this will throw no light on the subject; it will leave you where you are.

" * * * Mr. Lee brought the House of Commons before us again. He reprobated the rule—declared that the Clerk should not come within the bar of the House; that the proper mode was for the Sergeant-at-Arms, with a mace on his shoulder, to meet the Clerk at the door and receive his communication. We are not, however, provided for this ceremonious way of doing business, having neither mace nor sergeant, nor masters in chancery, who carry down bills from the English Lords. * * * Repeated accounts came that the Speaker and Representatives were at the door. Confusion ensued; the Members left their seats. Mr. Reed rose and called the attention of the Senate to the neglect that had been shown to Mr. Thomson, late Secretary. Mr. Lee rose to answer him; but I could not hear one word he said.

"The Speaker was introduced, followed by the Representatives. Here we sat an hour and ten minutes before the President arrived. This delay was owing to Lee, Izard, and Dalton, who had stayed with us until the Speaker came in, instead of going to attend the President.

"The President advanced between the Senators and Representatives, bowing to each. He was placed in the chair by the President of the Senate; the Senate, with their President, on the right; the Speaker and Representatives on his left. The President of the Senate rose and addressed a short sentence to him. The import of it was that he should now take the oath of office as President. He seemed to have forgot half of what he was to say, for he made a dead pause and stood for some time to appearance in a vacant mood. He finished with a formal bow, and the President was conducted out of the middle window into the gallery, and the oath administered by the chancelor. Notice that the business was done was communicated to the crowd, who gave three cheers, and repeated it on the President's bowing to them. As the company returned into the Chamber, the President took the chair and the Senate and Representatives their seats. He rose and all arose, and he addressed them. (See the address.)

"This great man was agitated and embarrassed more than ever he was by the leveled cannon or pointed musket. He trembled and several times could scarce make out to read, though it must be supposed he had often read it before. He made a flourish with his right hand which left rather an ungainly impression. I sincerely, for my part, wished all set ceremony in the hands of the dancing masters, and that this first of men had read off his address in the plainest manner, without ever taking his eyes from the paper; for I felt hurt that he was not first in everything. He was dressed in deep brown, with metal buttons with an eagle on them, white stockings, a bag, and sword.

"From the hall there was a grand procession to St. Paul's Church, where prayers were said by the bishop. The procession was well conducted and without accident as far as I have heard. The militia were under arms, lined the street near the church, made a good figure, and behaved well.

"* * * The Senate returned to their Chamber after service, formed, and took up the address. Our President called it his most gracious speech. I cannot approve of this. A committee was appointed on it—Johnson, Carroll, Patterson. Adjourned.

"In the evening there were grand fireworks. The Spanish Ambassador's house was adorned with transparent paintings; the French Minister's house was illuminated; the hall was grandly illuminated; and after all this the people went to bed."

Of course, it is now realized that Senator Maclay was quite cynical in his statements and that he had an exalted opinion of his self-righteousness.

THE TAKING OF THE OATH

Returning to the inaugural ceremonies. After General Washington entered the Senate Chamber he remained there but a few moments and was then formally conducted to the open gallery in front of the Senate Chamber looking out on Wall Street. At the last moment it was discovered that no Bible had been provided. Chancelor Robert R. Livingston, then grand master of Masons in New York, was to administer the oath. Maj. Jacob Morton, one of the aides, was at the time grand secretary of the grand lodge and a member of St. John's Lodge, No. 1, F. & A. M. Learning that there was no Bible in the hall Chancelor Livingston hastily despatched Major Morton to the lodge room of St. John's Lodge, No. 1, F. & A. M., where he secured a Bible and hurried back in time to place it upon the table already prepared for it. This Bible is still preserved by the lodge, and on the flyleaf is recorded the story of the first President's oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

Washington's appearance was the signal for a marvelous demonstration on the part of the assembled populace. It took some time to quiet the people. Above the balcony there was a canopy and from this red curtains had been suspended. The table was covered with a crimson cloth and on this there was placed a red cushion upon which the Bible rested. George Washington advanced to the front of the balcony, laid his hand upon his heart and bowed several times, and returned immediately to a chair near the table. There was a moment of silence. Then Chancelor Robert R. Livingston read the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution: "You do solemnly swear that you will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States and will, to the best of your ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." With bowed head President Washington repeated these words and added, "So help me God." The chancelor raised the Bible to the President's lips, who stooped and kissed it. A signal was given and a flag was raised on Federal Hall, there was a discharge of artillery at the Battery, and the bells of the city were rung. The newly inaugurated President waved his hand and bowed again and retired. Reentering the Senate Chamber he took his seat. When he began his inaugural address all present rose. His hand rested on a table and he was visibly agitated and embarrassed.

He later attended church, accompanied by the Vice President, the Speaker, and the two Houses of Congress. He walked to St. Paul's Chapel, followed by a military escort of about 500 men. The services in the church were conducted by the Rt. Rev. Samuel Provost, of the Episcopal Church of New York. No sermon was preached; prayers were offered and the Te Deum sung; after these services the President was driven home in his state coach.

CONTEMPORANEOUS ACCOUNTS OF THE CEREMONIES

A newspaper of the days says: "At 9 o'clock in the morning all the churches in the city were opened, and the people in prodigous numbers thronged these sacred temples and with one voice put up their prayers to Almighty God for the safety of the President."

Another account states:

"At noon Washington left his residence for the Federal Hall. He rode in what is described as 'a handsome state chariot drawn by four horses,' and was escorted by a troop of horse and several companies of infantry, the congressional committee of reception, and a number of dignitaries. All along the route the people greeted him with fervent exclamations of delight.

"He was received with great ceremony at the Federal Hall and conducted to the Senate Chamber, where Vice President Adams thus addressed him: 'Sir, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States are ready to attend you to take the oath required by the Constitution, which will be administered by the chancelor of the State of New York.' Washington replied, 'I am ready to proceed.' The Vice President then conducted him to the large balcony in front of the Senate Chamber, where the vast throng assembled in Wall and Broad Streets could witness the ceremony.

"A graphic and perhaps the most authentic account of Washington taking the oath is to be found in a letter written by Eliza Quincy, from which the following is quoted: 'I was on the roof of the first house in Broad Street, and so near Washington that I could almost hear him speak. The windows and the roofs of the houses were crowded, and in the streets the throng was so dense that it seemed as if one might literally walk on the heads of the people. The balcony of the hall was in full view of this assembled multitude. In the center of it was placed a table with a rich covering of red velvet, and upon this, on a crimson velvet cushion, lay a large and elegant Bible. This was all the paraphernalia for the august scene. All eyes were fixed upon the balcony, where, at the appointed hour, Washington entered, accompanied by the chancelor of the State of New York, who was to administer the oath; by John Adams, Vice President; Governor Clinton; and many other distinguished men. By the great body of the people he had probably never been seen except as a military hero. The first in war was now to be the first in peace. His entrance on the balcony was announced by universal shouts of joy and welcome. His appearance was most solemn and dignified. Advancing to the front of the balcony, he laid his hand on his heart, bowed several times, and then retired to an armchair near the table. The populace appeared to understand that the scene had overcome him and were at once hushed in profound silence.

"After a few moments Washington rose and came forward. Chancelor Livingston read the oath according to the form prescribed by the Constitution and Washington repeated it. Mr. Otis, the Secretary of the Senate, then took the Bible and raised it to the lips of Washington, who stooped and kissed the book. At this moment a signal was given by raising a flag upon the cupola of Federal Hall for a general discharge of artillery at the Battery. All the bells in the city rang out a peal of joy, and the assembled multitude sent forth a universal shout. The President again bowed to the people and then retired from a scene such as the proudest monarch never enjoyed."

[Applause.]

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs may be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House for the balance of the week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order of the House heretofore made the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield to permit me to submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not in position to recognize the gentleman for the purpose of submitting such request without the consent of the gentleman from Georgia. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield for this purpose?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE SUICIDE OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to announce to the House the suicide of the Republican Party, which killed itself here in Washington on yesterday, April 23, 1939. [Laughter and applause.]

Let me appeal to the Democrats in the House not to interrupt this solemn announcement with laughter or applause. As Shakespeare says, "Allay with some cold drops of modesty thy skipping spirits."

We have come to bury Caesar, not to applaud him. You understand that "Caesar" was the name given to the Republican elephant in 1932 for his generosity and his outstanding service to the country, in putting aside the "proffered crown" and turning the country over to the Democrats by renominating Herbert Hoover for President on a high-tariff platform—after the tariff had wrecked the country.

Mr. Hoover, with his keen insight, with which he discerned two chickens in every pot and two cars in every garage, seems to have forecast this event in a speech he delivered recently in Hoboken, N. J., entitled, "Devitalizing National Demons."

The deceased left a note, which was published in this morning's New York Times, giving good and sufficient reasons for the timely demise.

Funeral services have been arranged, and the names of the active pallbearers have been turned over to the Clerk. The list contains only Old Guard Republicans, and will be announced later.

Honorary pallbearers will be selected by the friends of the deceased, including Wall Street, the Power Trust, the Standard Oil Co., the Aluminum Co. of America, the tariff barons, and other favored interests.

Disorganized labor will be represented by Mr. John L. Lewis, one of the best assets, if not one of the best friends, the deceased ever had.

In this connection I think I should explain that the name of Mr. JENKINS of Ohio and that of Mr. TREADWAY, of Massachusetts, have been left off the list of active pallbearers for the reason that it is understood they both have funeral orations prepared. I understand Mr. JENKINS' address is already written and approved, and that Mr. TREADWAY will favor us with his feeble efforts just as soon as they can pass the censorship of the accredited representative of the New England tariff barons. Several Old Guard Republican Senators will probably be asked to say a few words. Other sorrowing Members, of both Houses, will be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The farmers of the West have hastened to send flowers—sunflowers, of course—which I understand are on their way and will arrive in due time.

The glee club of the League of Young Democrats has volunteered to do the singing. Owing to the Nation-wide demands for haste, they will be limited to one song, and have selected as their choice that old familiar hymn, Praise God, From Whom All Blessings Flow.

Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted to paraphrase the words of a great orator of a generation past and gone, I would say that the deceased had passed on life's highway the stone that marked the highest point when in an unguarded moment he took a dose of his own medicine and using his record for a pillow "fell into that dreamless sleep which kisses down his eyelids still."

Perhaps it may be best for all concerned, and we are prone to believe that it is best—in fact, we know it is best for the country as a whole—that just in what was thought to be the happiest, sunniest hour of the return voyage, when eager winds were kissing every sail, to thus dash against the same old rocks that caused the wreck in 1932, "and in an instant hear the billows roar above a sunken ship." [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the special orders for today I may address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimouse consent that on Thursday next at the conclusion of the business in order for the day, and after disposition of the special orders heretofore entered, I may address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a resolution from the Legislature of the State of Minnesota memorialing the Congress to enact legislation to rehabilitate the Great Lakes cut-over area.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, during the past few years the public has been showing an ever-increasing interest in the combined development of our rivers for navigation, hydroelectric power, and flood-control purposes. In view of the likelihood that the next Rivers and Harbors Act will authorize several multiple-purpose projects, I should like to describe one of the most meritorious projects of its kind in the United States. I refer to the proposed dam and reservoir at Clarks Hill on the Savannah River. This project will cost between $25,000,000 and $30,000,000, and it will produce annually about 500,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electric energy at a cost of about 2½ mills per kilowatt-hour for prime power, which is about 53 percent of the cost of steam-generated power in this territory. The proposed dam through regulatory works will also materially improve navigation on the Savannah River, as I shall later describe.

The Savannah River is the boundary line between the States of Georgia and South Carolina, and it has been an important artery of commerce since the days of the earliest settlements in these two States.

The characteristics of the river are especially favorable for a development of this type. The tides rise and fall for a distance of 50 miles inland from the sea, which phenomena have made possible the development of a splendid harbor at Savannah. Above Savannah the river has a moderate slope until it reaches Augusta, and this section of the river is navigable for barges.

The authorized navigation project, which will be completed this summer, will provide a depth of 6 feet during 85 percent of the year, but unfortunately the dry weather occurring every fall causes low river stages with a consequent reduction of loads being carried on barges. To state the case simply, the full benefits to navigation cannot be realized unless we have a larger flow of water during the dry-weather season, and this can best be accomplished through the construction of the Clarks Hill Reservoir.

Above Augusta the river has a rocky bottom; it flows between narrow valleys and its slopes increase rapidly to the headwaters which lie on the southern slopes of the Blue Ridge Mountains in North Carolina, over 5,000 feet above the sea. Although this section is especially favorable for the development of hydroelectric power and small amounts of water power have been produced during the last hundred years, the great power possibilities of the river remain unfulfilled.

It can be readily appreciated that ample rainfall is an essential requisite to the development of navigation and power on any river, and it is in this respect that the Savannah River watershed is one of the most favorable east of the Rocky Mountains. The average rainfall over its 10,579 square miles is 53 inches per year, which is far above the average when compared with other sections of the country. However, the most favorable aspect of the rainfall factor arises from the fact that its maximum rainfall, amounting to 83 inches, occurs in the upper portion of the watershed, where it can be caught in reservoirs and released uniformly throughout the year, thus producing a large output of prime power and at the same time materially increasing the low-water flows in the navigable section of the river between Augusta and Savannah.

It would be difficult to name a section of the country having greater need for a combined navigation, power, and flood-control improvement. It has been conservatively estimated that the benefits to be derived from Clarks Hill in the way of cheaper transportation, cheaper power, and more adequate flood protection would be realized over an area of more than 52,000 square miles, lying principally in the States of Georgia and South Carolina. More than 1,000,000 people living within this area require vast quantities of supplies which come from seaports, and they are consuming ever-increasing amounts of electricity in their homes and factories.

A recent survey to determine the potential commerce suitable for water transportation showed that an annual tonnage of over a million tons could be moved profitably on the Savannah River as soon as a dependable year-round channel is available. If transportation facilities for handling this great water traffic were available, the public would realize a savings of $586,000 every year. If we choose to be more conservative and assume that the future water commerce will consist only of such low-grade commodities as petroleum, brick, tile, pulpwood, and kaolin, the public would still realize a saving of two or three hundred thousand dollars annually. Naturally, my statements are qualified by the assumption that a dependable year-round channel will be provided.

The only practical way to secure a uniform channel for 100 percent of the time is to store water in reservoirs during rainy periods and to release the stored water at a uniform rate during dry periods. Not only will the Clarks Hill project, in which I have so much interest, accomplish this objective, but in so doing it will produce a large amount of power during the entire year and provide flood control to a group of counties in Georgia and South Carolina that lie along the Savannah River above and below the city of Augusta.

It has been definitely established that the power requirements of my territory will fully absorb the output of Clarks Hill. As is well known, there is no oil or coal in Georgia or South Carolina. I have previously referred to the increased consumption of electricity in homes and to our rapidly growing industrial status. While these are matters of common knowledge, the results of a scientific investigation is much more convincing. In 1937 the Federal Power Commission made a survey of the power market within reach of the Clarks Hill site, and it reported that the maximum demand for power had increased from 1,180,000 kilowatts in 1933 to 1,425,000 kilowatts in 1936, an increase of 20 percent in 3 years. The Commission also estimated that the power demand would exceed 2,000,000 kilowatts by 1941, which figure is far in excess of present capacity, plus all increases from new plants being constructed. The estimated average annual increase is 82,000 kilowatts. If work on the Clarks Hill project is started this year, it cannot be completed before 1942, 3 years hence. Since its installed capacity will be about 130,000 kilowatts, or less than the estimated increase in demand during the next 2 years, it is evident that the Clarks Hill output can be fully absorbed by the time it is completed.

On several occasions Congress has recognized the necessity of improving the Savannah River for navigation, each act calling for such further improvements as the traffic warranted. Although the 6-foot project, which was begun in 1934, is not quite completed the channel improvements thus far made have stimulated traffic to such an extent that the commerce for 1937 amounted to 129,000 tons. The fact that this amount of traffic has thrived on a partially completed channel, and in spite of the low-water conditions encountered each dry season, provides us with the convincing evidence of the future possibilities of the Savannah River.

Several years ago Congress ordered the Army engineers to make a thorough investigation of the potentialities of all our large rivers, including the Savannah. The results of this study are published in House Document No. 64, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session. In this report the Army engineers stated that a combined navigation, power, and flood-control project located at Clarks Hill is economically justified. This report was never acted upon by Congress.

In 1936 a special board appointed by the President submitted a report stating that the project was one of the best of its kind on any of the streams entering the Atlantic Ocean from the South Atlantic States, and it named as benefits to be derived therefrom improved navigation, the generation of power at a cost considerably below the cost of steam generation, and flood control.

In November 1936 Prof. Blake R. Van Leer, dean of engineering of the University of Florida, made an independent study of the possibilities of the Savannah River Basin for the National Resources Committee, and he recommended that the Clarks Hill project be placed in group 1 for immediate construction.

On November 1, 1938, the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate adopted a resolution requesting the Army engineers to review the House Document No. 64 report to determine the advisability of adoption of Clarks Hill as a Federal project. This report is now ready for consideration by the Congress. I am constantly impressed with the thoroughness with which the Army engineers and the Federal Power Commission carry on their work, and no one should have any doubts as to the soundness of this project, since the latest reports from these agencies are favorable and have been forwarded to Congress with the approval of the President.

Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned these several investigations to emphasize the fact that Clarks Hill is sound and practical and will be self-liquidating. The data available to the engineers have been collected over a long period of years, the investigations have been thorough, and the reports have been uniformly in the affirmative. I therefore reiterate that the project is worthy of early adoption, and there is every reason for its immediate construction.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. May I ask the gentleman what constitutes the principal cargoes that are transported up and down the Savannah River?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Due to the channel's not being dependable the year round, petroleum, brick, and building materials are among the chief products now transported.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Coal?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I do not think any coal is being transported now. As stated, without the development of Clarks Hill the channel would not be dependable the year round, and therefore coal and many other products would not be transported. With the development of Clarks Hill we will have a million tons annually that could be moved, probably consisting of coal, brick, all building materials, cotton, all agricultural products, fertilizer, tile, pulpwood, kaolin, and so forth. Augusta is the second largest inland cotton market in the world at the present time. At one time it was the largest.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. All of the Members of the House know that the gentleman now addressing us has been very earnest in his endeavor to bring about improvement of the Savannah River for purposes of navigation, flood control, and power. The gentleman has built up quite a sentiment in the House favorable to this treatment of that river; but what the gentleman has done with respect to the Savannah River is merely indicative of his attitude toward all official obligations. The gentleman in many respects holds a record that no other Member of the House can match. During his 6 years' service in the House he has not missed a single roll call. He has not missed a single meeting of his committee. He has not even been late in any engagement that he has had with reference to his work as a Congressman of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

If there is no question as to desirability, the only question requiring further clarification relates to the advisability of its being undertaken by the Federal Government. In the first place, if the development is undertaken by private interests, it is conceded that the benefits to the public will not be as large as if the project is constructed by the Federal Government. Experiences of the past have shown that privately owned hydroelectric plants are so operated as to derive the maximum amount in power generation with little consideration for navigation or flood control. The reasons for this are obvious. In other words, they store and release the water as their loads fluctuate, thus producing daily and weekly fluctuations in river stages below the dams. Needless to say, this method of operation results in unsatisfactory channel depths, lasting in some instances 2 or 3 days in a week, with corresponding handicaps to navigation for as much as a week. On the other hand, if the project is constructed by the Federal Government, the main plant at Clarks Hill will be operated at maximum efficiency, which procedure will cause fluctuations on discharge of water through its tailraces, and the project will substantially increase the economic value of the privately owned Stevens Creek plant, located between Clarks Hill and Augusta, and it will also be beneficial to the existing municipal canal which is owned by the city of Augusta.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARE. I am wondering whether or not the gentleman, before he concludes his remarks, will give us data to show the kind of a flood hazard that now exists in Augusta, Ga., which has a population of 70,000 or 75,000 people? I understand that this city is now surrounded by levees which were required from time to time to be built higher and higher at a very great expense on the part of the people of the city of Augusta and the surrounding country. I further understand this city has been destroyed a time or two, perhaps more, by floods of the Savannah River. I was wondering whether or not the gentleman would include in his remarks some data illustrating just what hazards will be overcome by the erection of this dam and the regulation of the flood waters in this river so that this city and its thousands of population will be protected hereafter by a dam. Will the gentleman include that in his remarks?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I thank the gentleman. Yes, the city of Augusta has suffered great property damage and some loss of life at different times during past years, and you can realize the fears of the citizens during the flood seasons. Of course, their levee has been strengthened to some extent, but with development of the Clarks Hill project no other money will have to be spent to strengthen the levee as has been done numerous times heretofore.

Another excellent feature about this project is that there are no highly valuable improvements or property that would be required for flowage purposes. The lands that would be inundated are to a great extent uninhabited, sparsely wooded tracts, and in many instances fields that are not cultivated.

This dam is supposed to be 110 feet high and more than a mile long. It will back water probably about 40 miles above the dam.

The project would materially relieve the unemployment situation in a large area, and the major portion of the cost would go into labor, either directly or indirectly.

I should also mention that both of the interested States—Georgia and South Carolina—have passed resolutions petitioning the Federal Government to construct this project.

I may say that the Senators and Congressmen from those States are vitally interested in the development of this project.

This action should eliminate those questions as to States' rights, which have blocked the construction of federally owned projects in several States.

According to estimates of the Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, as released to the press in 1936, the States of Georgia and South Carolina greatly increased their population between 1930 and 1935, and there is every reason to believe that the industrial possibilities of this section are just dawning.

In conclusion, let me repeat that the Clarks Hill project is sound; there are compelling reasons why it should be undertaken at once by the Federal Government. It has been approved by all Government agencies that have studied it. Its construction would add greatly to the welfare of the people whom I represent in Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARE. May I say in that connection that I have been very much impressed with the very enlightening statement in reference to the history of this project. May I add that four or five counties in my district, which would probably be adjacent to this territory, would be greatly benefited both from the standpoint of power and navigation, as well as flood control. I am very grateful that the gentleman has taken this time to give us the information he has with regard to this project.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I thank the gentleman. May I add further that people a hundred miles away from this river, more than a million in number, will be greatly benefited by the development of this project. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech made before the D. A. R. by my colleague from Louisiana [Mr. MOUTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a special order heretofore entered, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted to me today I have in mind narrating two incidents which occurred recently affecting the subject matter of my statement, and in addition I should like to discuss very briefly a bill I have introduced in the House of Representatives with which I wish to acquaint the Members of the House. In order that I may complete my statement despite the fact that my time may expire before I have finished my discussion of the bill, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, we all recall without pride the recent activity of the German Bund throughout the United States and especially do we recall with shame the meeting of this organization held in the city of New York on George Washington's Birthday—February 22 of this year. This last meeting has received national publicity, and we all remember how on that day from all parts of the city of New York in Madison Square Garden assembled the thousands of alien sympathizers to extol the virtues of the dictator form of government and to belittle the democratic form of government. They chanted their songs of praise of the German Reich and chanted their paeans of hate of our Republic.

Mr. Speaker, this meeting received the just condemnation of 130,000,000 red-blooded, patriotic Americans. It received just condemnation from the millions of our people who feel that no alien group should desecrate one of our most sacred national holidays and no alien group should seek to gain color and prestige to their meetings by draping them with American flags and American symbols of patriotism.

The other day something happened in one of the committees of Congress which should receive equally our condemnation. I speak of the recent hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs. This committee was engaged in the hearing of testimony of witnesses on bills designed to correct abuses from alien groups. In the midst of this testimony there appeared a Mr. Robert Pasley, Jr., attorney for the Civil Liberties Union, an admitted Communist, to give us the benefit of his views on matters of patriotism. Unafraid, unabashed, and unashamed, with the hardihood and temerity of a saint, and with all the brazen effrontery of a member of that disreputable organization, he appeared before that committee, seeking by artifice and cunning to beguile the membership of the committee to legislation for the benefit of his alien and communistic organization.

I am glad to say, Mr. Speaker, that as soon as the chairman, my good friend from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], learned of these facts he adjourned the committee and disbanded the hearings. So far as the present is concerned the matter is closed; but it is not closed in the minds and hearts of the millions of men and women who love our country and want to see it preserved. They are concerned over this incident and other incidents, and naturally want to know just where this thing will stop, and whether or not Communists, bunds, and all other alien sympathizers will continue to seek on the one hand to overwhelm by force, and on the other hand to undermine by clandestine and slimy underground conspiracies our great republican form of government. They want to know that these arch enemies of democracy are not going to be allowed to enter the sanctuaries of the highest legislative authority in the world, and through its committees and its processes and by use of disloyal methods and tainted testimony to befoul the records of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, many bills have been introduced in this session of Congress for the purpose of curbing such meetings and for the purpose of breaking up such groups who seek to undermine our Government. Some of these bills will undoubtedly pass during the course of this session. As for myself, I have not heretofore regarded the rancor of the alien and the spleen of the "isms" as of such serious consequences in this land; but after the meetings such as the one on George Washington's Birthday and the incident such as the testimony of an admitted Communist who enters the very sanctuary of government itself without fear and with the hardihood born of a warped and distorted mind, and after the multiplying incidents of the last few years, I believe it is time to act and to act drastically. The people of the United States want to see such undesirable people deported and sent back to the wretched land for which they are willing to sell their own self-respect and decency, and I join with them in this fervent desire.

I have introduced recently in this Congress a bill having for its purpose the correcting of this evil, at least to some extent. This bill requires all aliens coming to the United States, within 30 days after entry, to take an oath of allegiance to the United States Government and to repudiate all allegiance to all foreign powers, potentates, and governments. Of course, this does not include those people coming here on visits and for educational and other temporary purposes but only those who have in mind making this country a more or less permanent home. Should an alien fail to take this oath of allegiance and fail to repudiate allegiance to foreign powers within this period of time, under the provisions of my bill he will be immediately deported back to the land from whence he came. But even then he is not freed from all of the provisions of H. R. 5481. Under the theory of this bill, the terms by which he is admitted to this country require absolute allegiance from him. Even after he has made the declaration of loyalty to this Government, should he at any time thereafter become engaged in subversive activities designed to break down and undermine our republican form of government he again will be subject to deportation and the Secretary of Labor is authorized to immediately take appropriate steps to return him to the land of his birth.

Under this bill no hardship is imposed upon anyone. Congress simply lays down as a rule of admission that the foreigner coming to our shores must be loyal. As long as he remains loyal and by declaration evinces a desire to remain loyal to our form of government he is not molested. Only when he violates the terms upon which he is allowed entrance into this country is the alien an offender against our laws and subject to being sent back.

While it may be that this bill will not completely do away with all of our alien troubles, I yet believe it will go a long way toward accomplishing this purpose. It will certainly break up meetings such as the ones I have condemned in this speech. It will likewise have a most deleterious effect upon all subversive activities, whether they come from the anarchists, the Communists, the bund or the Fascists. It will put everyone who comes to our shores on record that this Nation demands loyalty and allegiance to one government only, namely, the United States of America.

I say advisedly that this country would be in far better shape today if it would ask of these aliens as they enter our land a declaration that they intend to be good, law-abiding, American citizens, repudiating allegiance to all foreign powers as of the date of their entry into this country.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to my good friend from Georgia.

Mr. COX. I wish to applaud the gentleman's very patriotic speech and to express the hope that the bill to which the gentleman has just made reference may come before the House for consideration and passage.

Mr. BROOKS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I fear, however, that even if the gentleman should succeed in bringing about the adoption of the bill he is sponsoring he would experience difficulty in seeing it properly administered. The fact that a Communist appeared before the gentleman's committee is not disturbing to me, but I am disturbed when I find Communists in key positions in many of the departments of the Government. You will find the Department of Labor honeycombed with many persons of the type as the man the gentleman has just denounced, referring particularly to the witness that appeared before the gentleman's committee. You will find such men in the Labor Relations Board, and you will find them as assistants in the administration of the wage and hour law. You will find them in many other places.

Mr. BROOKS. I thank the able gentleman; but if he will permit, I should like to finish my explanation of my bill.

Mr. COX. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. At some other time I shall embrace the opportunity, if such an opportunity does come to me, to name a large number of such persons. There is an influence that comes from somewhere that is playing upon that situation. It is one that ought to be exposed and the practice of providing berths in the Government for these "reds" brought to an end.

Mr. BROOKS. I appreciate the gentleman's support of my bill.

Some may say today what I have read in editorials in the press, that the mere requiring of a declaration of support of this Government may be without effect, but under the terms of my bill, I believe, that situation can be handled. If an alien upon reaching our shores within 30 days, as my bill would require, makes his declaration of intention to support this Government, that that becomes one of the terms of his entry into this land, and if he subsequently violates the terms of his entry he is subject to being deported. Therefore, if at any time after such a person comes into this land and makes this declaration he engages in subversive activities of any sort or any activities whose purpose is to weaken or undermine our form of government, then under the terms of this bill that person is subject to being immediately deported.

Some have said that we do not want American citizenship to be a penalty. However, this is not a case of requiring every alien to become a citizen of this country. On the contrary, I join with those who say that American citizenship should not be a penalty but should be considered a distinct honor and a benefit. An alien by being required to make a declaration of intention to support this Government does not become a citizen of this country. He must still comply with all the laws we presently have on the statute books in order to become a citizen. So my bill will serve a twofold purpose. It will make the alien declare upon his entry into this country that he intends to repudiate all allegiance to his former government and to support this Government, and, second, if after making this declaration he engages in subversive activities and fights this form of government and seeks to tear it down, either peaceably or forcibly, he is subject to immediate deportation.

This bill may not cure all of the evil, but I firmly believe that had such an enactment been on the statute books years ago many of our troubles with aliens would have been prevented. I firmly believe this bill will go far along the road toward eliminating subversive activities and building up a patriotic, law abiding, red-blooded American citizenry.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Does not the gentleman believe it would be highly advantageous to our Government at this particular time to recodify our immigration laws and simplify them so the people of the country could really understand what they are, and so the immigration laws could be more easily administered without there being as many loopholes as exist in the law today? Does not the gentleman believe this would be highly desirable?

Mr. BROOKS. Perhaps it might be desirable, but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that my bill does not touch the immigration question. My bill is very simple and is designed to correct one situation, the abuse arising from the presence in this country of aliens who do not intend to support our form of government and do not intend to be good, law-abiding citizens. We do not want this type of alien in our midst.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman believe enforcement of our immigration laws would be better than codification of them? The gentleman has no idea we are having any real honest effort at enforcement, has he?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not want to go into the question of enforcement at the present time; but I do want to urge the enactment of my bill dealing with aliens.

Mr. COX. But the gentleman does not believe there is really any honest effort being put forth to enforce our present immigration laws, does he?

Mr. BROOKS. I may say to my friend, the gentleman from Georgia, that there might be a more serious effort made to do away with subversive activities in the land, and this is what my bill strikes at, the elimination of subversive activities. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article written by Walter Lippmann appearing in the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief address by Bishop O'Hara, of the Catholic Church.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

WORK RELIEF IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, when the House had under consideration the deficiency appropriation bill for work relief, I suggested an amendment providing that $200,000,000 of the amount provided in the bill be used for W. P. A. work in the construction of public buildings to accommodate second- and third-class post offices, as well as county agents and people employed in other governmental agencies. This amendment was rejected, and subsequent thereto I introduced a special bill providing for an appropriation of $150,000,000 to be used in the same manner, and my purpose in securing time to address the House now is to invite attention to this bill—H. R. 3799—a bill which has a twofold purpose—first, to provide employment for the unemployed; second, to provide suitable buildings to accommodate second- and third-class post offices and provide quarters for other Federal agencies, such as county agents, home-demonstration agents, soil-conservation employees, farm-security offices, and other agencies of the Government.

A great deal of criticism has been directed against the Federal W. P. A. activities on account of large sums of money being spent without receiving tangible, material, or worthwhile results from such expenditures. Not a great many people object in toto to the policy of our Government in providing relief by way of employment to those who are helplessly without work and are in actual need of food and clothing, but there are many who insist that it is a mistake to continue to spend large sums of money annually upon the pretense of giving work to the needy and the unemployed without having something to show at the end of the year where a large percentage of the money has gone. It is my opinion and strong conviction that 99 out of every 100 W. P. A. workers would like to think and be able to show at the end of the year they have contributed something to the wealth of the Nation in return for the food and clothing furnished them and their families by a gracious Government. They would much rather point a finger of pride to a public building that will endure for generations as a monument to their skill and labor than to think they have spent their time in doing odd and miscellaneous jobs of little or doubtful value.

In viewing the situation from another angle we find that by the erection of the proposed buildings the wealth of the Nation will be increased by the value of such buildings, and the income to our Treasury, in many instances, would be increased by the annual rentals paid for such accommodations. Of course some will take exception to this statement by saying it will cost the Government as much, or more, to maintain these buildings as it does to pay rental for such accommodations. We admit this may prove to be true in some few cases where a building is erected to accommodate only one of the agencies referred to, but on the whole the maintenance cost will be less than the total rentals at present.

On the other hand, by the passage of this bill or adopting this policy, the Government will be doing exactly what it has been urging private industry to do for the past 5 or 6 years. What I am saying cannot be construed as a mere criticism, for we have been insisting upon industry to enlarge its activities in order to afford an increased employment to the unemployed.

Another argument advanced by some against this proposal is that a good portion of the appropriation will be used in the purchase of material and would not go directly for work relief. However, we must not forget that many more people will be afforded regular and permanent employment in industry if the bill should be enacted and the building program adopted.

Another argument favoring this bill is that the type of buildings contemplated when erected in our small towns and villages will be an incentive to civic pride on the part of the patrons of the office and vicinity.

In adopting the proposed policy or building program, it would mean that the Government is undertaking to provide a definite and worth-while program in the way of work relief. That is, it will mean the elimination or abandonment of a hit-and-miss kind of policy to aid and assist those who are absolutely in need of work. To repeat, it is a policy with two definite and distinct ideas in mind—one to furnish employment to those who are in need, and at the same time it will be a type of employment from which the Government and the country will obtain a return from the money spent in the way of an added national wealth.

And, Mr. Speaker, before concluding my remarks on this particular phase for a constructive and definite program for work relief, I want to suggest that upon the completion of the building program provided for in the bill, if it is found that conditions have not improved to the extent that private enterprise and industry are able to furnish employment to the unemployed, I suggest the Government then proceed to continue such a policy by constructing and maintaining public highways now traversed by rural free delivery carriers. Such a program would also be fundamentally sound and worth while. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have the right and power "to establish post offices and post roads." Ordinarily, a power granted carries with it the duty and obligation to exercise as well as to execute such a power.

Heretofore, Congress has exercised its power to establish and maintain post offices throughout the States; and if the Government is to continue the policy of furnishing employment to the unemployed, I see no good reason why it should not discharge its obligation by establishing and maintaining post roads. This would be another means of furnishing worth-while employment to those in need and at the same time effect a saving of many millions of dollars in the way of transportation costs to the Government as well as to many millions of farmers in transporting crops from farms to market. At the same time, such a program would take a burden off the States by eliminating the necessity for increasing highway construction programs; and I pause here long enough to suggest that an enlarged and continued highway construction program by the States may sooner or later bring disaster and economic bankruptcy to a number of the poorer States. I think it was Poor Richard who said, "He who goes a-borrowing will go a-sorrowing." This philosophy will apply to the State and Federal Government as truthfully and as well as to individuals. It is a well-recognized fact that any individual who adopts a policy of continued borrowing without making provision for the day of accounting will sooner or later come to grief. The same is equally true of a State or Federal Government. Many of the poorer States adopted long and ambitious programs for constructing highways by issuing long-term bonds upon the theory they will be able to liquidate same by levying high and increasing taxes on the consumption of gasoline without taking into account the possibility that this source of revenue may be terminated by a reduction or exhaustion of the supply of gasoline. I do not know of any assurance that the supply is inexhaustible. If such a catastrophe should arise and any of the poorer States should find itself encumbered with an enormous bonded indebtedness, the property of the people therein may suddenly be faced with a tax that would mean absolute destruction.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am in full agreement with what the gentleman is saying and in this connection it is interesting to note that various witnesses that have appeared before the Ways and Means Committee in connection with the Social Security Act, more particularly employers of labor, have given it as their opinion that the excessively high taxes we are now imposing are probably the main factor contributing to the great unemployment we have, because there is no profit left in business. By the time they have paid their taxes and observed all the other requirements there is nothing left and there is no incentive to take chances.

Mr. HARE. Of course, in my remarks I was referring primarily to the States, and in that connection I would not want to be placed in a position of being an alarmist or one who is opposed to a reasonable highway-construction program by the individual States, but I do want to emphasize the necessity for exercising a high degree of prudence in formulating such programs and the wisdom of taking due account of the fact that pay day is certain to come.

If the Federal Government is to continue to appropriate money for what is known as work relief, I submit it would be well to adopt the policy of having our post roads constructed and maintained by the W. P. A. facilities under the direction or in cooperation with the highway departments of the several States. Such a policy, as we have already said, will not only afford employment for the unemployed, but it will result in getting something of real value in return for money spent and, in turn, relieve the States of a continued and increased tax burden for constructing and maintaining a good portion of an incompleted highway system.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The system of granting Federal aid really puts a premium on State spending in many instances.

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. For instance, the Government says, "We will give you so much money to spend for road construction or for some other improvement, provided you spend an equal amount"; and, of course, the more the State spends the more it will get from the Government.

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. They do not realize it all comes from the same source.

Mr. HARE. The point I am making, however, is that fundamentally the Federal Government has the right—and, in a way, is charged with the responsibility of constructing and maintaining post roads, because the Constitution in the beginning made that provision.

There is no reason in theory or practice why the Federal Government should not assume the burden and responsibility of constructing and maintaining all post roads. The right and authority was delegated to Congress by the States in the ratification of the Constitution. It is positively, definitely, and clearly set forth therein, and we cannot understand why the Government heretofore has insisted that the States assume this responsibility, particularly since the Federal Government is trying to assume powers never delegated to it upon the pretense that it is anxious to assist the States in carrying their burdens and solving their many problems. Right now there is a lot of propaganda and a great movement on foot for the Federal Government to aid the States in social education, when there is not a scintilla of authority provided by the Constitution for such action. As a matter of fact, the word "education" or anything that could be substituted for it is not mentioned in the Constitution. On the contrary, it seems to have been studiedly avoided as a matter to be left entirely with the States, but I do not care to discuss this phase of the subject further than to emphasize the necessity of the Federal Government giving attention to and looking after those matters delegated to it by the States and provided for by the Constitution instead of running away from its duty and looking for fields in which to operate where it has no business or authority. If the Federal Government will assume to discharge its responsibilities in the construction and maintenance of highways, the States will then have sufficient revenues to establish and operate their systems of education in accordance with their own ideals of life, their own ideals of liberty, their own ideals of industry, and their own ideals of government. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Speaker of the House, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a letter received by the Speaker from Mr. Grover Whalen, president of the New York World's Fair 1939.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR 1939,
New York, April 21, 1939.

DEAR MR. BANKHEAD: In commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the inauguration of Gen. George Washington as first President of the United States here in the city of New York, the New York World's Fair 1939 will be officially opened by the President of the United States on April 30.

An invitation has been sent to each Member of Congress and his wife to honor us with their presence at these ceremonies. The Fair Corporation is supplying a special train to bring the Members of the two Houses of Congress and their wives to New York on April 30 and it is very much hoped that you will give us the pleasure of joining the group on the special train.

The special train will leave the Union Station in Washington at 8 o'clock sharp on the morning of April 30. The train will go directly to the World's Fair site, arriving about 12 noon. Busses will be provided within the fair grounds to take the Members and their wives to the United States Building where they have been invited to a luncheon which the United States Commission to the New York World's Fair is giving to the President. Following the luncheon, guests will proceed to the official platform directly in front of the United States Building where seats will be reserved. Following the official ceremonies and the inauguration of the fair by the President of the United States, the Governor of New York will unveil the monumental statue of George Washington in Constitution Mall. This ceremony will follow with the unveiling by Mayor LaGuardia of the statues of the Four Freedoms, which are situated also in Constitution Mall.

Guests will be free to make their own plans for dinner, and there will be ample facilities in that many restaurants will be in operation on the grounds.

The initial illumination ceremonies will take place as soon as darkness falls. This will include the illumination of the grounds and the starting of its many fountains by the use of cosmic rays. Prof. Albert Einstein will conduct this ceremony.

The special train will leave the fair grounds for Washington at 9 p. m. daylight-saving time or 8 p. m. Washington time, which will enable the Members of Congress and their wives to arrive in Washington at a reasonable hour.

For the convenience of the Members and their wives the special train both going and coming will carry dining cars.

In order that tickets of admission to the fair grounds and to the official platform may be sent to each person it is respectfully requested that each Member, if he has not already done so, send to the chief of ceremonials, World's Fair, New York, his acceptance of the invitation dispatched on April 1 to the opening ceremonies.

It is requested that you be good enough to notify the Sergeant at Arms of your House of Congress before Wednesday, April 26, whether or not you will use the special train in coming to New York and returning to Washington.

A representative of the fair corporation, Mr. John A. Blum, will be in Washington beginning Monday, April 24, to give any additional information required and may be reached through the Sergeants at Arms of the Houses of Congress.

Anticipating the pleasure of greeting you personally on April 30, I am

Sincerely yours,

GROVER A. WHALEN.

The Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED

Bills and joint resolutions of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

SENATE

TUESDAY, APRIL 25, 1939

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal loving Father, we thank Thee for this world of beauty in the midst of which we walk, for the dawning of light out of darkness, for the gifts of love and of friendship, for sunny memories, and for every hope by which we are inspired.

Help us, then, to live worthily as Thy children; to be true and just in meeting every experience of this day; to rise above all worry, fretting, fear, and hatred, and to live in an atmosphere of spiritual serenity, knowing that Thy love is round us and that underneath are Thine everlasting arms.

Bless every home in our beloved land with the abiding spirit of the Master, that parental tenderness and understanding, together with filial devotion and obedience, may be restored, to the development of those highest and holiest relationships in life, and grant that from the altar of every fireside prayer may be set forth in Thy sight as the incense, and the lifting up of hands may be as an evening sacrifice. In Thy dear Son's name we ask it. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, April 24, 1939, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] is engaged in the performance of duty as a member of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy, and, therefore, is absent from the Senate today.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART], and the Senators from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE and Mr. TYDINGS] are detained on important public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. I—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT (H. DOC. NO. 262)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, is the clerk going to read the message?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has requested the clerk to read the message from the President of the United States, which, under the rules, is a privileged matter and may be laid before the Senate at any time.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of the Reorganization Act of 1939 (Public, No. 19, 76th Cong., 1st sess.), approved April 3, 1939, I herewith transmit reorganization plan No. I, which, after investigation, I have prepared in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of the act; and I declare that with respect to each transfer, consolidation, or abolition made in reorganization plan No. I, I have found that such transfer, consolidation, or abolition is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes of section 1 (a) of the act.

In these days of ruthless attempts to destroy democratic government, it is baldly asserted that democracies must always be weak in order to be democratic at all; and that, therefore, it will be easy to crush all free states out of existence.

Confident in our Republic's 150 years of successful resistance to all subversive attempts upon it, whether from without or within, nevertheless, we must be constantly alert to the importance of keeping the tools of American democracy up to date. It is our responsibility to make sure that the people's government is in condition to carry out the people's will, promptly, effectively, without waste or lost motion.

In 1883, under President Arthur, we strengthened the machinery of democracy by the civil-service law; beginning in 1905 President Roosevelt initiated important inquiries into Federal administration; in 1911 President Taft named the Economy and Efficiency Commission, which made very important recommendations; in 1921, under Presidents Wilson and Harding, we tightened up our budgetary procedure. Presidents Theodore Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover in succession strongly recommended the rearrangement of Federal administrative activities. In 1937 I propcsed, on the basis of an inquiry authorized and appropriated for by the Congress, the strengthening of the administrative management of the executive establishment.

None of all this long series of suggestions, running over more than a quarter of a century, was in any sense personal or partisan in design.

These measures have all had only one supreme purpose—to make democracy work, to strengthen the arms of democracy in peace or war, and to insure the solid blessings of free government to our people in increasing measure.

We are not free if our administration is weak. But we are free if we know, and others know, that we are strong; that we can be tough as well as tender-hearted; and that what the American people decide to do can and will be done.

capably and effectively, with the best national equipment that modern organizing ability can supply in a country where management and organization is so well understood in private affairs.

My whole purpose in submitting this plan is to improve the administrative management of the Republic, and I feel confident that our Nation is united in this central purpose, regardless of differences upon details.

This plan is concerned with the practical necessity of reducing the number of agencies which report directly to the President, and also of giving the President assistance in dealing with the entire executive branch by modern means of administrative management.

Forty years ago, in 1899, President McKinley could deal with the whole machinery of the executive branch through his 8 Cabinet Secretaries and the heads of 2 commissions, and there was but 1 commission of the so-called quasi-judicial type in existence. He could keep in touch with all the work through 8 or 10 persons.

Now, 40 years later, not only do some 30 major agencies (to say nothing of the minor ones) report directly to the President, but there are several quasi-judicial bodies which have enough administrative work to require them also to see him on important executive matters.

It has become physically impossible for one man to see so many persons, to receive reports directly from them, and to attempt to advise them on their own problems which they submit. In addition the President today has the task of trying to keep their programs in step with each other or in line with the national policy laid down by the Congress. And he must seek to prevent unnecessary duplication of effort.

The administrative assistants provided for the President in the Reorganization Act cannot perform these functions of over-all management and direction. Their task will be to help me get information and condense and summarize it—they are not to become in any sense Assistant Presidents, nor are they to have any authority over anybody in any department or agency.

The only way in which the President can be relieved of the physically impossible task of directly dealing with 30 or 40 major agencies is by reorganization—by the regrouping of agencies according to their major purposes under responsible heads who will report to the President, just as is contemplated by the Reorganization Act of 1939.

This act says that the President shall investigate the organization of all agencies of the Government and determine what changes are necessary to accomplish any one or more of five definite purposes:

(1) To reduce expenditures.

(2) To increase efficiency.

(3) To consolidate agencies according to major purposes.

(4) To reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions and by abolishing such as may not be necessary.

(5) To eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort.

It being obviously impracticable to complete this task at one time, but having due regard to the declaration of Congress that it should be accomplished immediately and speedily, I have decided to undertake it promptly in several steps.

The first step is to improve the over-all management; that is, to do those things which will accomplish the purposes set out in the law, and which at the same time will reduce the difficulties of the President in dealing with the multifarious agencies of the executive branch and assist him in distributing his responsibilities as the chief administrator of the Government by providing him with the necessary organization and machinery for better administrative management.

The second step is to improve the allocation of departmental activities, that is, to do those things which will accomplish the purposes set out in the law and at the same time help that part of the work of the executive branch which is carried on through executive departments and agencies. In all this the responsibility to the people is through the President.

The third step is to improve intradepartmental management; that is, to do those things which will enable the heads of departments and agencies the better to carry out their own duties and distribute their own work among their several assistants and subordinates.

Each of these three steps may require from time to time the submission of one or more plans involving one or more reorganizations, but it is my purpose to fulfill the duty imposed upon me by the Congress as expeditiously as practicable and to the fullest extent possible in view of the exceptions and exemptions set out in the act.

The plan I now transmit is divided into four parts or sections which I shall describe briefly as follows:

PART 1. EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

In my message to the Congress of January 12, 1937, in discussing the problem of how to improve the administrative management of the executive branch, I transmitted with my approval, certain recommendations for strengthening and developing the management arms of the President. Those three management arms deal with (1) Budget, and efficiency research, (2) planning, and (3) personnel. My accumulated experience during the 2 years since that time has deepened my conviction that it is necessary for the President to have direct access to these managerial agencies in order that he may have the machinery to enable him to carry out his constitutional responsibility, and in order that he may be able to control expenditures, to increase efficiency, to eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort, and to be able to get the information which will permit him the better to advise the Congress concerning the state of the Union and the program of the Government.

Therefore, I find it necessary and desirable in carrying out the purposes of the act to transfer the Bureau of the Budget to the Executive Office of the President from the Treasury Department. It is apparent from the legislative history of the Budget and Accounting Act that it was the purpose in 1921 to set up an executive budget for which the President would be primarily responsible to the Congress and to the people, and that the Director of the Budget was to act under the immediate direction and supervision of the President. While no serious difficulties have been encountered because of the fact that the Bureau of the Budget was placed in the Treasury Department so far as making budgetary estimates has been concerned, it is apparent that its coordinating activities and its research and investigational activities recently provided for by the Congress, will be facilitated if the Bureau is not a part of one of the 10 executive departments. Also, in order that the Bureau of the Budget may the better carry out its work of coordination and investigation, I find it desirable and necessary in order to accomplish the purposes of the act to transfer to the Bureau of the Budget the functions of the Central Statistical Board.

By these transfers to the Executive Office, the President will be given immediate access to that managerial agency which is concerned with the preparation and administration of the Budget, with the coordination of the work of the governmental agencies, and with research and investigation necessary to accomplish the five definite purposes of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

I also find it necessary and desirable to transfer to the Executive Office of the President the National Resources Committee, now an independent establishment, and to consolidate with it by transfer from the Department of Commerce the functions of the Federal Employment Stabilization Office, the consolidated unit to be known as the National Resources Planning Board. This Board would be made up as is the present Advisory Board of the National Resources Committee of citizens giving part-time services to the Government, who, aided by their technical staff, would be able to advise the President, the Congress, and the people with respect to plans and programs for the conservation of the national resources, physical and human. By these transfers to the Executive Office the President will be given more direct access to and immediate direction over that agency which is concerned with planning for the utilization and conservation of the national resources, an indispensable part of the equipment of the Chief Executive.

On previous occasions I have recommended, and I hereby renew and emphasize my recommendation, that the work of this Board be placed upon a permanent statutory basis.

Because of an exemption in the act it is impossible to transfer to the Executive Office the administration of the third managerial function of the Government, that of personnel. However, I desire to inform the Congress that it is my purpose to name one of the administrative assistants to the President, authorized in the Reorganization Act of 1939, to serve as a liaison agent of the White House on personnel management.

In this manner the President will be given for the first time direct access to the three principal necessary management agencies of the Government. None of the three belongs in any existing department. With their assistance and with this reorganization, it will be possible for the President to continue the task of making investigations of the organization of the Government in order to control expenditures, increase efficiency, and eliminate overlapping.

PART 2. FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY

Studies heretofore made by me and researches made at my direction, as well as recommendations submitted by me to the Congress, and especially those contained in my message of January 12, 1937, indicate clearly that to carry out the purposes of the Reorganization Act of 1939 to group, coordinate, and consolidate agencies of the Government according to major purposes and to reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions under a single head would require the provision of 3 general agencies in addition to the 10 executive departments.

It is my objective, then, by transfer, consolidation, and abolition to set up a Federal Security Agency, a Federal Works Agency, and a Federal Loan Agency, and then to distribute among the 10 executive departments and these 3 new agencies the major independent establishments in the Government—excepting those exempt from the operations of the act—in order to minimize overlapping and duplication, to increase efficiency and to reduce expenditures to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient operation of the Government.

I find it necessary and desirable to group in a Federal security agency those agencies of the Government, the major purposes of which are to promote social and economic security, educational opportunity, and the health of the citizens of the Nation.

The agencies to be grouped are the Social Security Board, now an independent establishment; the United States Employment Service, now in the Department of Labor; the Office of Education, now in the Department of the Interior; the Public Health Service, now in the Treasury Department; the National Youth Administration, now in the Works Progress Administration; and the Civilian Conservation Corps, now an independent agency.

The Social Security Board is placed under the Federal Security Agency, and at the same time the United States Employment Service is transferred from the Department of Labor and consolidated with the unemployment compensation functions of the Social Security Board in order that their similar and related functions of social and economic security may be placed under a single head and their internal operations simplified and integrated.

The unemployment compensation functions of the Social Security Board and the employment service of the Department of Labor are concerned with the same problem, that of the employment, or the unemployment, of the individual worker.

Therefore they deal necessarily with the same individual. These particular services to the particular individual also are bound up with the public assistance activities of the Social Security Board. Not only will these similar functions be more efficiently and economically administered at the Federal level by such grouping and consolidation but this transfer and merger also will be to the advantage of the administration of State social security programs and result in considerable saving of money in the administrative costs of the governments of the 48 States as well as those of the United States. In addition to this saving of money there will be a considerable saving of time and energy not only on the part of administrative officials concerned with this program in both Federal and State Governments but also on the part of employers and workers, permitting through the simplification of procedures a reduction in the number of reports required and the elimination of unnecessary duplication in contacts with workers and with employers.

Because of the relationship of the educational opportunities of the country to the security of its individual citizens, the Office of Education, with all of its functions, including, of course, its administration of Federal-State programs of vocational education, is transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Federal Security Agency. This transfer does not increase or extend the activities of the Federal Government in respect to education, but does move the existing activities into a grouping where the work may be carried on more efficiently and expeditiously, and where coordination and the elimination of overlapping may be better accomplished. The Office of Education has no relationship to the other functions of the Department of the Interior.

The Public Health Service is transferred from the Treasury Department to the Federal Security Agency. It is obvious that the health activities of the Federal Government may be better carried out when so grouped than if they are left in the Treasury, which is primarily a fiscal agency, and where the necessary relationships with other social security, employment, and educational activities now must be carried on by an elaborate scheme of interdepartmental committee work.

The National Youth Administration is transferred from the Works Progress Administration to the Federal Security Agency since its major purpose is to extend the educational opportunities of the youth of the country and to bring them through the processes of training into the possession of skills which enable them to find employment. Other divisions of the Federal Security Agency will have the task of finding jobs, providing for unemployment compensation, and other phases of social security, while still other units of the new agency will be concerned with the problem of primary and secondary education, as well as vocational education and job training and retraining for employment. While much of the work of the National Youth Administration has been carried on through work projects, these have been merely the process through which its major purpose was accomplished, and, therefore, this agency under the terms of the act should be grouped with the other security agencies rather than with the work agencies.

For similar reasons the Civilian Conservation Corps, now an independent establishment, is placed under the Federal Security Agency, because of the fact that its major purpose is to promote the welfare and further the training of the individuals who make up the corps, important as may be the construction work which they have carried on so successfully. The Civilian Conservation Corps is a small coordinating agency which supervises work carried on with the cooperation of several regular departments and independent units of the Government. This transfer would not interfere with the plan of work heretofore carried on, but it would enable the Civilian Conservation Corps to coordinate its policies, as well as its operations, with those other agencies of the Government concerned with the educational and health activities and with human security.

PART 3. FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY

In order to carry out the purpose of the Reorganization Act of 1939, I find it necessary and desirable to group and consolidate under a Federal Works Agency those agencies of the Federal Government dealing with public works not incidental to the normal work of other departments, and which administer Federal grants or loans to State and local governments or other agencies for the purposes of construction.

The agencies so to be grouped are the Bureau of Public Roads, now in the Department of Agriculture; the Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division, now in the Treasury Department, and the Branch of Building Management of the National Park Service, so far as it is concerned with public buildings which it operates for other departments or agencies, now in the Department of the Interior; the United States Housing Authority, now in the Department of the Interior; the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, familiarly known as P. W. A.; and the Works Progress Administration, familiarly known as W. P. A., except the functions of the National Youth Administration.

The transfer of both the Public Works Administration and the Works Progress Administration to the new Federal Works Agency would provide for both principal types of public works that have been carried on by the Federal Government directly or in cooperation with the State and local governments. I find that it will be possible to reduce administrative costs as well as to improve efficiency and to eliminate overlapping by bringing these different programs of public works under a common head. But, because of the differences that justified their separate operation in the past and differences that will continue in the future to distinguish certain phases of major public works from work relief, I find it necessary to maintain them, at least for the present, as separate subordinate units of the Federal Works Agency.

The present Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works is placed under the Federal Works Agency under the shorter name of Public Works Administration.

The name of the Works Progress Administration has been changed to Works Projects Administration in order to make its title more descriptive of its major purpose.

The Bureau of Public Roads is transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Federal Works Agency and as a separate unit under the name of Public Roads Administration. This will bring the administration of the Federal roads program with its grants-in-aid to the States into coordination with other major public-works programs and other programs of grants and loans to the States.

The construction and operation of many public buildings is now carried on in two agencies which are consolidated under the new Federal Works Agency, namely, the Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department, which is concerned with the construction of Federal buildings and with the operation of many public buildings outside the District of Columbia, and the Branch of Building Management of the National Park Service of the Department of the Interior, which is concerned with the operation of public buildings in the District of Columbia. These two separate activities are consolidated in one unit, to be known as the Public Buildings Administration. Improved efficiency, coordination of effort, and savings will result from this transfer and consolidation.

Then, also, there is transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Federal Works Agency the United States Housing Authority. The major purpose of the United States Housing Authority is to administer grants-in-aid and loans to local public housing authorities in accordance with its established standards of construction in that part of the housing field which cannot be reached economically by private enterprise. For these reasons, it should be grouped with those other agencies which have to do with public works, with grants and loans to State and local governments, and with construction practices and standards.

PART 4. FEDERAL LOAN AGENCY AND TRANSFERS OF INDEPENDENT LENDING AGENCIES

In order to carry out the purposes of the Reorganization Act of 1939 I find it necessary and desirable to group under a Federal Loan Agency those independent lending agencies of the Government which have been established from time to time for the purpose of stimulating and stabilizing the financial, commercial, and industrial enterprises of the Nation.

The agencies to be so grouped in the Federal Loan Agency are: The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Electric Home and Farm Authority, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Federal Housing Administration and their associated agencies and boards, as well as the Export-Import Bank of Washington.

Since 1916 the Congress has established from time to time agencies for providing loans, directly or indirectly, for the stimulation and stabilization of agriculture, and such agencies should in my opinion be grouped with the other agricultural activities of the Government. For that reason I find it necessary and desirable to accomplish the purposes of the act to transfer the Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, and the Commodity Credit Corporation and associated agencies to the Department of Agriculture.

ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY

One of the five purposes of the Reorganization Act of 1939 is "to reduce expenditures to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient operation of the Government." This purpose is important in each phase of the plan here presented. The Reorganization Act prohibits abolishing functions—in other words basic services or activities performed. Therefore the reduction in expenditures to be effected must necessarily be brought about chiefly in the overhead administrative expenses of the agencies set up to perform certain functions. The chance for economy arises therefore not from stopping work, but from organizing the work and the overhead more efficiently in combination with other similar activities. Only the Congress can abolish or curtail functions now provided by law.

The overhead administrative costs of all the agencies affected in reorganization plan No. 1 is about $235,000,000. This does not include the loans they make, the benefits they pay, the wages of the unemployed who have been given jobs, it does not include the loans and grants to States or, in short, the functional expense. It does include the overhead expense of operating and administering all these agencies.

The reduction of administrative expenditures which it is probable will be brought about by the taking effect of the reorganizations specified in the plan is estimated as nearly as may be at between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000 annually, a substantial lowering of the existing overhead. Certain of these economies can be brought about almost immediately, others will require a painstaking and gradual readjustment in the machinery and business practices of the Government.

Any such estimate is incomplete, however, without reference to the corresponding savings which will follow in the States and cities through the recommended consolidation of the Federal services with which they cooperate, and the improved efficiency and convenience which will be felt by citizens all over the Nation, many of whom will be able to find in a single office many of the services now scattered in several places. These economies will undoubtedly exceed the direct savings in the Federal Budget.

It will not be necessary to ask the Congress for any additional appropriations for the administrative expenses of the three consolidated agencies set up in this plan, since their costs will be met from funds now available for the administrative expenses of their component units. Actually new expenses will be only a fractional part of the expected savings.

Neither on this reorganization plan No. I nor on future reorganization plans, covering interdepartmental changes and intradepartmental changes, will every person agree on each and every detail. It is true that out of the many groupings and regroupings proposed in this message a few of the individual agencies could conceivably be placed elsewhere.

Nevertheless, I have been seeking to consider the functional origin and purpose of each agency as required by the reorganization bill itself.

If in the future experience shows that one or two of them should be regrouped, it will be wholly possible for the President and the Congress to make the change.

The plan presented herewith represents 2 years of study. It is a simple and easily understood plan. It conforms to methods of executive administration used by large private enterprises which are engaged in many lines of production. Finally, it will save a sum of money large in comparison with the existing overhead of the agencies involved.

I trust, therefore, that the Congress will view the plan as a whole and make it possible to take the first step in improving the executive administration of the Government of the United States.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1939.

Reorganization plan No. I, accompanying the President's message, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. I

Prepared by the President and transmitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled April 25, 1939, pursuant to the provisions of the Reorganization Act of 1939, approved April 3, 1939

PART 1. EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

SECTION 1. Bureau of the Budget: The Bureau of the Budget and all of its functions and personnel (including the Director and Assistant Director) are hereby transferred from the Treasury Department to the Executive Office of the President, and the functions of the Bureau of the Budget shall be administered by the Director thereof under the direction and supervision of the President.

SEC. 2. Central Statistical Board: The Central Statistical Board and all of its functions and personnel (including the Chairman and the members of the Board) are hereby transferred to the Bureau of the Budget in the Executive Office of the President. The Chairman of the Board shall perform such administrative duties as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall direct.

SEC. 3. Central Statistical Committee abolished and functions transferred: The Central Statistical Committee is hereby abolished and its functions are transferred to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to be administered by him under the direction and supervision of the President. The Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall promptly wind up any outstanding affairs of the Central Statistical Committee.

SEC. 4. National Resources Planning Board: (a) The functions of the National Resources Committee, established by Executive Order No. 7065 of June 7, 1935, and its personnel (except the members of the committee) and all of the functions of the Federal employment stabilization office in the Department of Commerce and its personnel are hereby transferred to the Executive Office of the President. The functions transferred by this section are hereby consolidated, and they shall be administered under the direction and supervision of the President by the National Resources Planning Board (hereafter referred to as the Board), which shall be composed of five members to be appointed by the President. The President shall designate one of the members of the Board as chairman and another as vice chairman. The vice chairman shall act as chairman in the absence of the chairman or in the event of a vacancy in that office. The members of the Board shall be compensated at the rate of $50 per day for time spent in attending and traveling to and from meetings or in otherwise exercising the functions and duties of the Board, plus the actual cost of transportation: Provided, That in no case shall a member be entitled to receive compensation for more than 30 days' service in 2 consecutive months.

(b) The Board shall determine the rules of its own proceedings, and a majority of its members in office shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but the Board may function notwithstanding vacancies.

(c) The Board may appoint necessary officers and employees and may delegate to such officers authority to perform such duties and make such expenditures as may be necessary.

SEC. 5. National Resources Committee abolished: The National Resources Committee is hereby abolished, and its outstanding affairs shall be wound up by the National Resources Planning Board.

SEC. 6. Federal Employment Stabilization Office abolished: The Federal Employment Stabilization Office is hereby abolished, and the Secretary of Commerce shall promptly wind up its affairs.

SEC. 7. Transfer of records and property: All records and property (including office equipment) of the several agencies transferred, or the functions of which are transferred, by this part are hereby transferred to the Executive Office of the President for use in the administration of the agencies and functions transferred by this part.

SEC. 8. Transfer of funds: So much of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the use of any agency in the exercise of any functions transferred by this part, or for the use of the head of any department or agency in the exercise of any functions so transferred, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine, shall be transferred to the Executive Office of the President for use in connection with the exercise of functions transferred by this part. In determining the amount to be transferred the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer: Provided, That the use of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds transferred by this section shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 (d) (3) and section 9 of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

SEC. 9. Personnel: Any personnel transferred by this part found to be in excess of the personnel necessary for the efficient administration of the functions transferred by this part shall be retransferred under existing law to other positions in the Government service, or separated from the service subject to the provisions of section 10 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

PART 2. FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY

SECTION 201. Federal Security Agency: (a) The United States Employment Service in the Department of Labor and its functions and personnel are transferred from the Department of Labor; the Office of Education in the Department of the Interior and its functions and personnel (including the Commissioner of Education) are transferred from the Department of the Interior; the Public Health Service in the Department of the Treasury and its functions and personnel (including the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service) are transferred from the Department of the Treasury; the National Youth Administration within the Works Progress Administration and its functions and personnel (including its Administrator) are transferred from the Works Progress Administration; and these agencies and their functions, together with the Social Security Board and its functions, and the Civilian Conservation Corps and its functions, are hereby consolidated under one agency to be known as the Federal Security Agency, with a Federal Security Administrator at the head thereof. The Federal Security Administrator shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $12,000 per annum. He shall have general direction and supervision over the administration of the several agencies consolidated into the Federal Security Agency by this section and shall be responsible for the coordination of their functions and activities.

(b) The Federal Security Administrator shall appoint an Assistant Federal Security Administrator, who shall receive a salary at the rate of $9,000 per annum, and he may also appoint such other personnel and make such expenditures as may be necessary.

(c) The Assistant Administrator shall act as Administrator during the absence or disability of the Administrator or in the event of a vacancy in that office and shall perform such other duties as the Administrator shall direct.

(d) The several agencies and functions consolidated by this section into the Federal Security Agency shall carry with them their personnel.

SEC. 202. Social Security Board: The Social Security Board and its functions shall be administered as a part of the Federal Security Agency under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator. The Chairman of the Social Security Board shall perform such administrative duties as the Federal Security Administrator shall direct.

SEC. 203. United States Employment Service: (a) The functions of the United States Employment Service shall be consolidated with the unemployment-compensation functions of the Social Security Board and shall be administered in the Social Security Board in connection with such unemployment compensation functions under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

(b) The office of the Director of the United States Employment Service is hereby abolished, and all of the functions of such office are transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Social Security Board.

(c) All functions of the Secretary of Labor relating to the administration of the United States Employment Service are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 204. Office of Education: (a) The Office of Education and its functions shall be administered by the Commissioner of Education under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

(b) All functions of the Secretary of the Interior relating to the administration of the Office of Education are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 205. Public Health Service: (a) The Public Health Service and its functions shall be administered by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

(b) All the functions of the Secretary of the Treasury relating to the administration of the Public Health Service, except those functions relating to the acceptance and investment of gifts as authorized by sections 23 (b) and 137 (e), title 42, United States Code, are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 206. National Youth Administration: The National Youth Administration and its functions shall be administered by the National Youth Administrator under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 207. Civilian Conservation Corps: The Civilian Conservation Corps and its functions shall be administered by the Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps, under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 208. Transfer of records and property: All records and property (including office equipment) of the several agencies which, with their functions, are consolidated by section 201 into the Federal Security Agency are hereby transferred to the jurisdiction and control of the Federal Security Agency for use in the administration of the agencies and functions consolidated by that section.

SEC. 209. Transfer of funds: So much of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) available for the use of any agency in the exercise of any functions transferred by this part or for the use of the head of any department or agency in the exercise of any functions so transferred as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine shall be transferred for use in connection with the exercise of the functions transferred by this part. In determining the amount to be transferred the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer: Provided, That the use of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds transferred by this section shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 (d) (3) and section 9 of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

SEC. 210. Administrative funds: The Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall allocate to the Federal Security Agency, from appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the administrative expenses of the agencies and functions consolidated by this part such sums, and in such proportions, as he may find necessary for the administrative expenses of the Federal Security Agency.

SEC. 211. Personnel: Any personnel transferred by this part found to be in excess of the personnel necessary for the efficient administration of the functions transferred by this part shall be retransferred under existing law to other positions in the Government service or separated from the service, subject to the provisions of section 10 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

PART 3. FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY

SECTION 301. Federal Works Agency: (a) The Bureau of Public Roads in the Department of Agriculture and its functions and personnel (including the Chief thereof) are transferred from the Department of Agriculture; the Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division in the Treasury Department and its functions and personnel are transferred from the Treasury Department; the Branch of Buildings Management of the National Park Service in the Department of the Interior and its functions and personnel (except those relating to monuments and memorials), and the functions of the National Park Service in the District of Columbia in connection with the general assignment of space, the selection of sites for public buildings, and the determination of the priority in which the construction or enlargement of public buildings shall be undertaken, and the personnel engaged exclusively in the administration of such functions, and the United States Housing Authority in the Department of the Interior and its functions and personnel (including the Administrator), are transferred from the Department of the Interior; and all of these agencies and functions, together with the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works and its functions, and all of the Works Progress Administration and its functions (except the National Youth Administration and its functions), are hereby consolidated into one agency to be known as the Federal Works Agency, with a Federal Works Administrator at the head thereof. The Federal Works Administrator shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $12,000 per annum. He shall have general direction and supervision over the administration of the several agencies consolidated into the Federal Works Agency by this section and shall be responsible for the coordination of their functions.

(b) The Federal Works Administrator shall appoint an Assistant Federal Works Administrator, who shall receive a salary at the rate of $9,000 per annum, and he may also appoint such other personnel and make such expenditures as may be necessary.

(c) The Assistant Administrator shall act as Administrator during the absence or disability of the Administrator, or in the event of a vacancy in that office, and shall perform such other duties as the Administrator shall direct.

(d) The several agencies and functions consolidated by this section in the Federal Works Agency shall carry with them their personnel.

SEC. 302. Public Roads Administration: (a) The Bureau of Public Roads and its functions shall be administered as the Public Roads Administration, at the head of which shall be the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, whose title shall be changed to Commissioner of Public Roads. Hereafter the Commissioner of Public Roads shall be appointed by the Federal Works Administrator.

(b) All functions of the Secretary of Agriculture relating to the administration of the Bureau of Public Roads are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 303. Public Buildings Administration: (a) The Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division and its functions, the Branch of Buildings Management of the National Park Service and its functions (except those relating to monuments and memorials), and the functions of the National Park Service in the District of Columbia in connection with the general assignment of space, the selection of sites for public buildings, and the determination of the priority in which the construction or enlargement of public buildings shall be undertaken, are hereby consolidated and shall be administered as the Public Buildings Administration, with a Commissioner of Public Buildings at the head thereof. The Commissioner of Public Buildings shall be appointed by the Federal Works Administrator and shall receive a salary at the rate of $9,000 per annum. The Commissioner of Public Buildings shall act under the direction and supervision of the Federal Works Administrator.

(b) All functions of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of Procurement relating to the administration of the Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division and to the selection of location and sites for public buildings, and all functions of the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the National Park Service relating to the administration of the functions of the Branch of Buildings Management and the functions of the National Park Service in the District of Columbia in connection with the general assignment of space, the selection of sites for public buildings, and the determination of the priority in which the construction or enlargement of public buildings shall be undertaken, are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 304. United States Housing Authority: (a) The United States Housing Authority and its functions shall be administered by the United States Housing Administrator under the direction and supervision of the Federal Works Administrator.

(b) All functions of the Secretary of the Interior relating to the administration of the United States Housing Authority are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 305. Public Works Administration: The Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works and its functions shall be administered as the Public Works Administration with a Commissioner of Public Works as the head thereof. The Commissioner of Public Works shall be appointed by the Federal Works Administrator and shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum. The Commissioner of Public Works shall act under the direction and supervision of the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 306. Work Projects Administration: The Works Progress Administration and its functions (except the National Youth Administration and its functions) shall be administered as the Work Projects Administration, with a Commissioner of Work Projects at the head thereof. The Commissioner shall be appointed by the Federal Works Administrator and shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum. The Commissioner shall act under the direction and supervision of the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 307. Transfer of records and property: All records and property (including office equipment) of the several agencies which, with their functions, are consolidated by section 301 into the Federal Works Agency are hereby transferred to the jurisdiction and control of the Federal Works Agency for use in the administration of the agencies and functions consolidated by that section.

SEC. 308. Transfer of funds: (a) So much of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the use of any agency (except the United States Housing Authority) in the exercise of any functions transferred by this part, or for the use of the head of any department or agency in the exercise of any functions so transferred, and so much of such balances available to the United States Housing Authority for administrative expenses, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine, shall be transferred for use in connection with the exercise of the functions transferred by this part. In determining the amount to be transferred the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer: Provided, That the use of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds transferred by this section shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 (d) (3) and section 9 of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

(b) All unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the use of the United States Housing Authority, other than those transferred by subsection (a) of this section, are hereby transferred with the United States Housing Authority and shall remain available to it for the exercise of its functions.

SEC. 309. Administrative funds: The Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall allocate to the Federal Works Agency, from appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the administrative expenses of the agencies and functions consolidated by section 301, such sums, and in such proportions, as he may find necessary for the administrative expenses of the Federal Works Agency.

SEC. 310. Personnel: Any of the personnel transferred by this part found to be in excess of the personnel necessary for the efficient administration of the functions transferred by this part shall be retransferred under existing law to other positions in the Government service or separated from the service subject to the provisions of section 10 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

PART 4. LENDING AGENCIES

SECTION 401. (a) Transfers to the Department of Agriculture: The Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, and the Commodity Credit Corporation, and their functions and activities, together with their respective personnel, records, and property (including office equipment), are hereby transferred to the Department of Agriculture and shall be administered in such Department under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be responsible for the coordination of their functions and activities.

(b) Transfer of administrative funds: So much of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the administrative expenses of any agency transferred by this section, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine, shall be transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture for such use; and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall allocate to the Secretary of Agriculture from such funds, such sums, and in such proportions as he may find necessary for the administrative expenses of the Secretary of Agriculture in connection with the agencies and functions transferred by this section. In determining the amount to be transferred the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer. The use of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds transferred by this subsection shall be subject to the provision of section 4 (d) (3) and section 9 of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

(c) Transfer of other funds: All unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds, other than those mentioned in subsection (b) of this section, available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for any agency transferred by subsection (a) of this section shall be transferred with such agency and shall remain available to it for the exercise of its functions.

(d) Personnel: Any of the personnel transferred by this section to the Department of Agriculture which the Secretary of Agriculture shall find to be in excess of the personnel necessary for the administration of the functions transferred by this section shall be retransferred under existing law to other positions in the Government or separated from the service subject to the provisions of section 10 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

SEC. 402. (a) Federal Loan Agency: There shall be at the seat of the Government a Federal Loan Agency, with a Federal Loan Administrator at the head thereof. The Federal Loan Administrator shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $12,000 per annum.

(b) Assistant Federal Loan Administrator: The Federal Loan Administrator shall appoint an Assistant Federal Loan Administrator, who shall receive a salary at the rate of $9,000 per annum. The Assistant Administrator shall act as Administrator during the absence or disability of the Administrator or in the event of a vacancy in that office, and shall perform such other duties as the Administrator shall direct.

(c) Powers and duties of Administrator: The Administrator shall supervise the administration, and shall be responsible for the coordination of the functions and activities of the following agencies: Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Electric Home and Farm Authority, RFC Mortgage Co., Disaster Loan Corporation, Federal National Mortgage Association, Federal Home Loan Bank Board, Home Owners' Loan Corporation, Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, Federal Housing Administration, and Export-Import Bank of Washington. The Administrator may appoint such officers and employees and make such expenditures as may be necessary.

(d) Administrative funds: The Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall allocate to the Federal Loan Agency from appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the administrative expenses of the agencies named in this section, such sums, and in such proportion as he may find necessary for the administrative expenses of the Federal Loan Agency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message and the accompanying document will be referred to the Select Committee on Government Organization.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President's reorganization message and the accompanying document be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts praying for the enactment of legislation to insure the neutrality of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the following resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolutions memorializing Congress in favor of legislation increasing the amounts of old-age assistance payable by the Federal Government to States and their political subdivisions

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby urges the Congress of the United States to amend title I of the Social Security Act so as to provide that States and their political subdivisions, which grant old-age assistance over and above the amount entitling them to receive from the Federal Government the maximum partial reimbursement now provided by said title I, be reimbursed in full by the Federal Government for so much of such excess as does not exceed a certain limit to be fixed by said Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth forthwith forward copies of these resolutions to the Presiding Officers of both branches of Congress and to the Members thereof from this Commonwealth.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the advertising of alcoholic beverages by press and radio, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts favoring the enactment of legislation to increase the amounts of old-age assistance payable by the Government to States and their political subdivisions, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. WALSH.)

RESOLUTION OF SENATE OF TENNESSEE—DEPORTATION OF ALIENS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a resolution adopted by the Senate of the Legislature of Tennessee, memorializing the Federal Congress to enact adequate legislation providing for the speedy deportation of all alien residents who do not signify their willingness, desire, and intention to become citizens of the United States within a reasonable time after entry into the United States of America.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution presented by the Senator from Tennessee will be received, printed under the rule in the RECORD, and properly referred.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Immigration, as follows:

Senate Resolution 15

Resolution memorializing the Federal Congress to enact adequate legislation providing for speedy deportation of all alien residents who do not signify their willingness, desire, and intention to become citizens of the United States within a reasonable time after entry into the United States of America

Whereas it is estimated that there are approximately 8,000,000 residents within the boundaries of the United States of America, who have neither become naturalized nor filed any declaration of intention to become citizens of this Nation; and

Whereas this large group of alien residents provide a fertile field for agitators and organizations who are not in sympathy with the American form of government; and

Whereas it is the sense of the State Senate of the State of Tennessee, that this large group of alien residents should not be permitted to enjoy the freedom and privileges of this Nation without assuming the corresponding duties and obligations of citizenship: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Tennessee, That the Federal Congress be, and it is hereby requested to direct its attention to this condition and to enact adequate legislation which will provide for speedy deportation of all alien residents of this country, who do not within a reasonable time signify their willingness, desire, and intention, and qualify, to assume the obligations of citizenship and become citizens of this United States of America; be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the State be, and he is hereby directed to transmit properly authenticated copies of this resolution to each member of the Tennessee congressional delegation and to each of the United States Senators from Tennessee.

LOW-COST HOUSING

Mr. WAGNER presented a communication embodying a resolution of the Commissioners of the Housing Authority of the City of El Paso, Tex., which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSING AUTHORITY OF THE CITY OF EL PASO, TEX.,
El Paso, Tex., April 17, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: At a meeting of the commissioners of the Housing Authority of the City of El Paso, Tex., held on April 13, 1939, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas there has been introduced in the Senate of the United States by Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER a bill which, if enacted, will amend the United States Housing Act of 1937, which is bill S. 591; and

"Whereas this bill will provide funds to permit a normal continuity for the program of slum clearance and low-rent housing; and

"Whereas it is desirous that the local authority record its approval of the amendment to the Housing Act: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Housing Authority of the City of El Paso, Tex., That in the interest of the avowed purposes of the slum clearance and low-rent housing program of the United States, this authority urge the Congress to approve of Senator WAGNER'S bill; and

"That the Senate Committee on Education and Labor and the House Committee on Banking and Currency be urged to favorably report the bill out of committee."

A copy of this resolution has been forwarded to Senators TOM CONNALLY, MORRIS SHEPPARD, DAVID I. WALSH, ALLEN J. ELLENDER, JOSH LEE, JAMES J. DAVIS, and ROBERT A. TAFT, and to Representatives WRIGHT PATMAN and R. E. THOMASON, all of whom have been urged to give the bill their favorable consideration.

Respectfully yours,

A. B. SWAIN,
Executive Director and Secretary.

CAPITAL STRUCTURE OF RAILROADS

Mr. WAGNER presented a communication embodying a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Port Henry, N. Y., which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Port Henry, N. Y., April 20, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WAGNER: At a regular meeting of the Port Henry Chamber of Commerce, held April 14, 1939, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas it has come to the attention of the chamber that the so-called Chandler bill, H. R. 5407, contemplating the simplified method for a railroad to make readjustments in its capital structure provided it can secure the consent of 75 percent of the creditors, and which is commonly known as the voluntary adjustment bill; and

"Whereas we understand that this bill has been favorably reported by the House Committee on the Judiciary and is now on the calendar of the House: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That this chamber go on record as favoring the adoption of this bill; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Members of Congress urging them to support this bill on the grounds that it is not a controversial matter and would, we believe, be very helpful to certain railroad companies."

Respectfully submitted this 20th day of April 1939.

PORT HENRY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
C. A. ANDERSON, Treasurer.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

CENSUS OF HOUSING

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to provide for a national census of housing, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, together with an accompanying letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the bill and letter presented by the Senator from New York will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2240) to provide for a national census of housing was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to provide information concerning the number, character, and geographical distribution of dwelling structures and dwelling units in the United States and concerning the social and economic characteristics of their ownership and use, necessary to aid in the formulation of a national housing program and in the administration of housing legislation, the Director of the Census shall take a census of housing in each State, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and Alaska in the year 1940 and every 5 years thereafter, and shall be authorized to make such supplementary studies (either in advance of or after the taking of such censuses) as are necessary to the completion thereof. The census of housing to be taken in the year 1940 shall be taken in conjunction with the population inquiry of the Sixteenth Decennial Census. Each census of housing shall relate as closely as possible to the day and month provided by law for the population census.

SEC. 2. All of the provisions, including penalties, of the act providing for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved June 18, 1929 (46 Stat. 21; U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 13, ch. 4), shall apply to the taking of the census provided for in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 3. For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act during the Sixteenth Decennial Census period there is authorized to be appropriated, out of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum sufficient to cover the estimated cost of such census.

The accompanying letter presented by Mr. WAGNER is as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., March 8, 1939.

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: In connection with the various housing programs in which the Federal Government participates, there has developed a pressing need for reliable information on all phases of housing conditions in the United States. To insure the most economical, efficient, and intelligent development of our housing and home-building programs, it is essential that a complete housing census be undertaken at the earliest possible date. If such a housing census were to yield information most valuable from the standpoint of economic and social planning, it should be taken simultaneously and in conjunction with the census of population in 1940.

It is my hope that you will agree with this view of the American Federation of Labor and will deem it possible and desirable to introduce legislation authorizing a complete housing census and providing the necessary appropriation therefor.

Sincerely yours,

WM. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE, MEMPHIS, TENN.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask consent to introduce for appropriate reference a bridge bill creating the Memphis and Little Rock Bridge Commission, defining the authority, power, and duties of said commission; and authorizing said commission and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Memphis, Tenn., and for other purposes.

This bridge is badly needed across the great Mississippi at Memphis, and I express a hope that the Congress may speedily pass it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill of the Senator from Tennessee will be received and properly referred.

The bill (S. 2242) creating the Memphis and Little Rock Bridge Commission; defining the authority, power, and duties of said commission; and authorizing said commission and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Memphis, Tenn.; and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 5488. An act to provide for the widening of Wisconsin Avenue in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

H. R. 5679. An act to amend the Code of Law of the District of Columbia in respect to fees of the United States marshal; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion by Mr. GEORGE, the Committee on Finance was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1077) for the relief of Victor S. Banks, and it was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5269, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, 1940, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place insert the following:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to further carry out the provisions of section 32, as amended, of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1935, and subject to all provisions of law relating to the expenditure of funds appropriated by such section, $150,000,000. Such sum shall be immediately available and shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, other appropriations made by such section or for the purpose of such section: Provided, That not in excess of 25 percent of the funds herein made available may be devoted to any one agricultural commodity. So much of such funds as may be devoted to encouraging the exportation of cotton or cotton articles, and any other funds which may be available or may hereafter be made available for the purpose of encouraging the exportation of cotton or cotton articles, shall be expended in accordance with the provisions of the following new section which is hereby added to the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, as amended:

"'SEC. 23. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make payments in kind or in money to any person who exports any raw cotton or articles manufactured in whole or in part from cotton, at such rates and under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture determines are necessary in order that the cotton, or the cotton content in cotton articles, so exported shall be fully competitive in the world markets: Provided, That such payments shall be discontinued during any marketing year when exports of cotton from the United States during such marketing year equal the average of the exports from the United States during the 10-year period ending July 31, 1932. Such payments on raw cotton are authorized to be made only upon cotton bought in the open market, except that payments may be made upon cotton released from loans made or made available by the Commodity Credit Corporation when cotton of suitable classes and quantities to fill cotton export requirements is not available in the markets of the United States. The Secretary is authorized to decide when such free cotton is not so available; but no such payments shall be made, and no obligation to make such payments shall be incurred, prior to January 1, 1940, with respect to any cotton on which a loan has been made or made available by the Commodity Credit Corporation, nor shall such payments be made or obligations incurred during the period from August 1 to December 31, both inclusive, in any marketing year with respect to any cotton on which any such loan has been made.

"'(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commodity Credit Corporation is authorized and directed, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, upon application by the owner, or his assignee, of cotton held under loans made or made available by the Commodity Credit Corporation to provide for the release to such owner, or his assignee, of any or all of the cotton of such owner, or assignee, during any marketing year, except during the period from August 1 to December 31, both inclusive, if the Secretary of Agriculture finds that the release of cotton held under such loans (1) is needed to supply suitable classes and quantities of cotton to meet the operating requirements of mills in the United States and is not available in the markets of the United States, or (2) is needed to supply suitable classes and quantities of cotton to meet export requirements and is not available in the markets of the United States. Such cotton shall be released at a cost to the owner, or his assignee, equal to the current loan rate, plus (1) interest, insurance, and storage, for the period beginning at the average time when cotton was put into the current loan and ending at the end of the month when the cotton is released from the loan, and (2) one-fourth cent per pound for miscellaneous charges.

"'(c) The Commodity Credit Corporation is authorized and directed under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture to acquire and to make available to him such cotton as may be necessary to make payments in kind authorized by this section. The funds now and hereafter made available to the Commodity Credit Corporation are hereby made available to such Corporation to acquire and make available to the Secretary of Agriculture such cotton as may be necessary to make the payments in kind authorized under this section, and to provide for the release of cotton under this section. The funds now or hereafter made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of encouraging the exportation of cotton or cotton articles, including, but not limited to, the funds now or hereafter made available by, or for carrying out the purposes of, this title, section 32, as amended, of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1935, as amended, and sections 7 to 17, inclusive, of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, are hereby made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for payments authorized in this section, and for administrative expenses in accordance with the applicable provisions of this title. The determinations of the Secretary of Agriculture made pursuant to the provisions of this section and the facts constituting the basis for any payment when officially determined in conformity with the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture shall be final and conclusive.'"

APPROPRIATIONS FOR MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4630) making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 9, 10, 16, 17, 19, 20, 23, 27, 32, and 35.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 14, 21, 22, 24, 25, 26, 28, and 29, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "thirteen thousand one hundred and six"; and the Senate agree to the same.

EUROPE AND AMERICA

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in my opinion there could be nothing more helpful to the people of the United States than a careful study of American history from 1914 to 1919. We undertook at that time to pursue a course which we thought was a course of peace, and we found it was the path of war. It is my opinion that we should carefully reconsider the entire story from 1914 to 1919, for therein we find much advice which we ought to follow at this time.

An editorial entitled "Again" is published in the Saturday Evening Post of April 22. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks, but before that is done I desire to read a paragraph which gives the illustration I had in mind in my opening remarks:

Again the fires of revenge are lighted. Again the tracings of scar tissue on the map of Europe are tumescent and red. The aggressor is loose and heavily armed—more heavily than ever before, thanks to not having paid his American debts. The non-aggressors also are heavily armed—more heavily than ever before, thanks to not having paid their American debts—and yet, as they think, not heavily enough. Again France and England are calling to America for help. To help them? No, no. To help them save for mankind the priceless legacy that is Europe.

I ask that the editorial from the Saturday Evening Post may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of April 22, 1939]

AGAIN

It was the righteous-warrior dream. We would go to war to end war. Where? On another continent—where, since the beginning of historic time, there had been only interludes of peace.

We would make the world safe for democracy. Where? In Europe—where the only relation of the individual to the state that has ever been understood, or perhaps ever will be, is that of subject.

We would establish the divine right of political self-determination for minorities. Where? In that Old World—where the symbol of a minority is a broken sword, where every racial fragment burns on its altar the incense of revenge, where there is no boundary between nations but it is a trace of scar tissue.

The romantic theme of the dream was to say that we had no quarrel with any people, certainly none with the German people. Indeed, if they would only hear us they would know that we were not at war with them.

It was for their own good that we were going to destroy the war lords that had made them to go forth against their will to kill other gentle and peace-loving people.

So we took part with England and France and all who were fighting Germany. They did not understand what we were saying any more than the Germans did; but whatever it was, it was all right for the moment because it meant an American army in France and unlimited access to the United States Treasury, where they could cash their I O U's for billions; each government as it signed another one, being required only to promise that when the war was over it would take it up with an interest-bearing bond.

The war ended in what, for Europe, was another truce.

Incredulous European ears heard us say that we would take nothing for ourselves, only a just and durable peace. Cynical European eyes watched the American Jehovah of Peace and his band of angels as they sat down in Paris to redraw the map of Europe in the zigzag lines of simple humanity and justice. Every line they drew would be another trace of scar tissue. They did not know that because they did not know Europe.

Between the dreaming peace bringers and the hard-eyed truce-makers lay 2,500 years of bloodstained history. The peace bringers were for wiping all of that out in the drawing. The truce makers knew better. They knew also how impermanent the drawing was. Having laid down for themselves the principal lines of the next war and then the lines stipulated for in their secret treaties, they were willing that the Americans should play with the fringe.

The fact was that the hard-eyed Europeans were deeply concerned about something else, a thing the Americans would not understand. For once and for the first time, they faced the fact that the ancient and honorable business of war was bankrupt on its own premises. It had gone too far. The stakes had got too high. There was no profit in victory. Revenge, yes, advantage and territory; but no cash on the drumhead. They could charge it all to Germany in the customary manner, as Germany before had charged it to them, but this time that meant nothing at all, because it was more than Germany could pay.

The idea of making the Americans pay is supposed to have occurred first to the practical British mind. That does not matter. They had all discovered what a dream mine the United States Treasury was, and it may very easily have occurred to all of them at once in a spontaneous manner. When you are meditating desperately on money, you think, naturally, of where it is and who has it.

Anyhow, it became at once the controlling idea of Europe, uniting friend and foe. And, naturally, it was England's part, since she had the advantage of language, to lead the propaganda, which she did.

The propaganda was a symphony in two movements. The first movement was that the richest, most unselfish, most romantic people in the world—so rich they could afford to take the decisive part in a world war and want nothing material out of it—now owed it to themselves, to mankind, to civilization, to lend their wealth in a prodigal manner to rehabilitate this fallen Europe—a theme which the richest and most romantic people in the world received with swelling pride. The second movement was that after having lent their wealth for that purpose, they would be a hateful, money-loving, Shylock people ever to want any of it back.

It was England that named the United States "Shylock."

It was England that struck hands with Germany and proposed to forego her share in German reparations and forgive her own war debtors, who would then forgive one another and Germany all around, if only the great rich Shylock Nation across the sea would forgive England her war debt to the United States Treasury.

It was the British Government, commanding the serpent's-tooth rhetoric of Lord Balfour and the insulting tongue of a Chancelor of the Exchequer, that called upon the world to witness that America, the Shylock, valuing gold more than blood, sacrifice, or friendship, was bleeding Europe white by exacting her pound of flesh in the name of war debts—at a time when the only money Europe was paying us on account of either the interest or principal of the war debts was money begrudgingly shaved from the proceeds of new American loans. Out of each new loan, so long as she could borrow, she paid a little on account of old loans, and that is the only kind of money we ever got back—a little of our own.

After we entered the war, in addition to the cost of our own exertions, represented by an Army of 2,000,000 men in Europe, the United States Treasury lent the several Allied Governments $7,000,000,000 on their I O U's. For nearly 2 years after the armistice the United States Treasury continued to lend not to the same Allied Governments only but also to new Governments like Czechoslovakia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, and Jugoslavia, until the competitive clamor for more, more became indecently brazen. When at last the United States Treasury slammed its doors in disgust, the amount owing to it by the governments of Europe on their promissory notes was more than eleven billions.

Germany meanwhile, running her colossal mark swindle, had discovered in Wall Street the world's first bottomless well of money-lending gullibility. Overnight Europe transferred her operations from the Americans' Public Treasury to their private purse.

The cost of money in Wall Street was but the cost of the engravers' art. The borrowers were no higglers. Upon bonds still wet from the printing press they were willing to write any rate of interest—6, 7, 8 percent. What difference did it make? The money would never be paid back.

Rehabilitation became a word of fantasy. We were lending Europe the money to rehabilitate her agriculture, her industry, her life. We had done better to throw it away, for not only did we lose it but the effect of it was to subsidize European industry in competition with our own, as we may see now in South America, besides subsidizing the start of her rearmament for the next war.

After Germany had purposely gone bankrupt to defraud her creditors, after the amazing mark swindle of which Americans were the principal alien victims, we lent her the money to set up a new Reichsbank on a gold basis. We lent her the money to make over her factories for mass production in the American example, to restore her railroads, to build schools, city halls, stadiums, highways, and playgrounds, and to clear her city slums. More than that—incredibly more—we lent her the money to pay her war reparations to the victors. All the German reparations that were ever paid were paid with American money. France got most of it because she was the principal beneficiary of reparations; she used it partly to reconstruct her devastated areas and partly to pay something on her war debts to England.

An American traveler in Europe at this time might have pointed with pride to almost anything that glittered in the sun and said, "See, an American loan!" If he was from Peoria or Ottumwa, his bank in Peoria or Ottumwa had some of the bonds that did it, and the world was a wonderful place.

Meanwhile, those I O U's for eleven billions in the United States Treasury were all unacknowledged and fading. But by this time the infatuation was such that many Americans were themselves supporting the European thesis that we could well afford to forget the war debts and go on with the great work of rehabilitation. Was it not that work that was keeping our factories busy? It was. There was no limit to the amount of goods Europe would buy, so long as we lent her the money to buy them with. In the end they would cost her nothing.

The United States Treasury thought differently. It thought the European governments ought at least to acknowledge their war debts and agree to pay what they could afford to pay. This they both pleasantly and unpleasantly declined to do.

The time came when Great Britain was eager to put the pound sterling back on a gold basis, and this she dared not try to do with the United States Treasury holding her overdue note of hand for five billions. In this dilemma, and with very bad grace, never for one moment suspending her propaganda for cancelation, she came one day to the United States Treasury and gave a bond for her I O U's, as she had promised to do—not a bond in full, but for 80 cents on the dollar—and on her way home she stopped in Wall Street and borrowed $300,000,000 gold for the Bank of England. When she got home she began calling us "Shylock" again.

No other war debtor remembered its I O U's at the United States Treasury until the American Government announced the policy that any of them on their way to Wall Street to borrow more money from the American purse would have to stop first in Washington and in some way acknowledge their war debts. Then France came and gave a bond for her I O U's at about 50 cents on the dollar, Italy a bond for hers at about 25 cents on the dollar, and so on; and all of them, on their way home, stopped in Wall Street and got their hands deeper into the private American purse.

So it was that, besides lending Europe money for every other conceivable purpose, we lent her the money to pay all that she ever did pay on account of her war debts to the United States Treasury. When at last she had borrowed the American purse empty, and every big and little American banks' investment portfolio was stuffed with her bonds, she stopped paying anything. That was of all Europe, save only for one little honorable state named Finland.

Between cause and effect there was no decent delay. As soon as the stream of American loans stopped Germany purposely went bankrupt again, the payment of war reparations stopped, our European war debtors treated their bonds in the United States Treasury with satire, and in American banks from Maine to California foreign securities were tied up in bundles like old newspapers and kicked into the cellar.

To save less than $200,000,000 a year Great Britain dishonored her bond at the United States Treasury. How many times that sum does she spend on new armament?

For $125,000,000 a year France dishonored her bond at the United States Treasury. Yet now she can find the cash to buy a fleet of bombing planes in the United States.

The value of Italy's word is known. It is worth less than $20,000,000 a year.

Germany's word was not worth writing.

British word, French word, Nazi or Fascist—which will you take on a bond? If you will not take it on a bond, what will you take it for? On a treaty, perhaps.

The idea that united them worked. Victor and vanquished together, they made the Americans pay.

Item, the cost of our own military exertions in the World War; item, the war and postarmistice loans made to the governments of Europe by the United States Treasury; item, the loss on European loans made from the private American purse; item, accrued interest—add it all up and it comes to this: That our passion to save Europe has already cost us more than $50,000,000,000.

What have we learned? The righteous warrior dream now is 22 years old and we are still asleep.

Again the fires of revenge are lighted. Again the tracings of scar tissue on the map of Europe are tumescent and red. The aggressor is loose and heavily armed—more heavily than ever before, thanks to not having paid his American debts. The nonaggressors also are heavily armed—more heavily than ever before, thanks to not having paid their American debts—and yet, as they think, not heavily enough. Again France and England are calling to America for help. To help them? No, no. To help them save for mankind the priceless legacy that is Europe.

Well, what more shall be again?

ONE HUNDREDTH BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF ROSWELL K. COLCORD

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, on this the 25th day of April, there is in the State of Nevada celebrating his one hundredth birthday, a citizen who was born in the glorious State of Maine, but who in his early years went forward to follow the setting sun into the Golden West. He has rounded out a great career in the silver State of Nevada, where his lifetime has been spent, and where he has given some of the most valuable advice and leadership that any man of the West has ever given. He was Governor of the State of Nevada and gave to that great State and to its people one of the finest administrations that America has ever known from a Governor's chair.

Today is the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. Today, as he celebrates the one hundredth anniversary of his birth, the people of the State of Nevada are joining with him, that they may extend to him their heartfelt gratitude and congratulations. As he walks the streets of the capital city of Nevada every human being there respects, admires, and reveres him. Over 110,000 square miles of the great State which gave the West so much of history, the name of Roswell K. Colcord is revered as a native of the State of Maine who went to the West to make the West what it is, the savior of the Nation—the greatest territory in all the world, and the place where in the days to come humanity and civilization will find its greatest center.

Mr. President, on the anniversary of the birth of that great man, Roswell K. Colcord, former Governor of Nevada, I ask that the Senate receive and immediately consider a resolution which I submit on behalf of the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Missouri in the chair). Without objection, the resolution will be received. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 128) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Whereas Roswell K. Colcord, born in North Searsport, Maine, emigrated to the West in the year 1857 and there engaged in silver mining, became Governor of the State of Nevada in 1890, and later director of the United States Mint in Carson City, Nev.; and

Whereas the said Roswell K. Colcord becomes 100 years of age on this the 25th day of April 1939: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States, noting with gratification the high standard of character maintained throughout his long life and the high quality of public service rendered by him, extends to him heartiest congratulations and the cordial good wishes of all its Members.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Routine morning business having been concluded, the calendar, under rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the calling of the calendar begin with calendar No. 325, House bill 2098, inasmuch as all previous bills on the calendar were called last Thursday.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I ask the majority leader if he would be willing to amend his request so as to revert to Calendar No. 208, Senate Joint Resolution 11, and let the joint resolution come up for the purpose of making a moton to proceed to consider it?

Mr. BARKLEY. I had in mind that immediately following the call of the calendar the Senator could move to take up the joint resolution. I think that would be a better course than to try to pass the joint resolution on the call of the calendar. I have conferred with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], as has the Senator from Vermont, and that course is entirely agreeable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none; and the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar under rule VIII, beginning with calendar No. 325, House bill 2098.

BLOCK BOOKING AND BLIND SELLING—MOTION TO DISCHARGE COMMITTEE PLACED ON TABLE CALENDAR

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, Senate bill 280, to prohibit and to prevent the trade practices known as compulsory block booking and blind selling in the leasing of motion-picture films in interstate and foreign commerce, was introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. The subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, before which the bill has been pending, has held hearings and is considering the proposed legislation. In order that the motion to discharge the Committee on Interstate Commerce from the further consideration of the bill may not be called every time we have a morning hour, I ask unanimous consent that the the motion go to the table calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will proceed with the call of the calendar.

KATHERINE PATTERSON

The bill (H. R. 2098) for the relief of Katherine Patterson was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH N. THIELE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4133) for the relief of Joseph N. Thiele, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 11, after the word "section", to strike out "40" and insert "49", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Joseph N. Thiele, postmaster at Whitewater, Wis., with the sum of $11,736.84, representing the amount of public funds and property lost in the burglary of the post office at Whitewater, Wis., on February 1, 1937, such loss having resulted from no fault or negligence on the part of said postmaster, as determined by the Postmaster General under a provision in title 39, United States Code, section 49.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ROLAND HANSON

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1160) for the relief of Roland Hanson, a minor, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the words "the sum of", to strike out "$5,687.75" and insert "$500"; and in line 11, after the numerals "1937", to insert "and to Dr. E. A. Julien, of Turlock, Calif., the sum of $200, in full satisfaction of his claim for professional services rendered said Roland Hanson", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the legal guardian of Roland Hanson, a minor, of Turlock, Calif., the sum of $500, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for damages for injuries sustained by him as a result of being struck by a United States Army truck on Highway No. 99 in Turlock, Calif., on May 23, 1937, and to Dr. E. A. Julien, of Turlock, Calif., the sum of $200, in full satisfaction of his claim for professional services rendered said Roland Hanson: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with such claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with such claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Roland Hanson, a minor; and Dr. E. A. Julien."

HUGH M'GUIRE

The bill (S. 765) for the relief of Hugh McGuire was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $600 to Hugh McGuire, of Turner, Mont., in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for the loss of his truck, such truck having been destroyed on December 5, 1936, by a fire which burned a garage at Turner, Mont., in which it was stored for the purpose of safeguarding its load, consisting of property used in connection with Resettlement Administration projects: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

ERNEST O. ROBINETTE ET AL.

The bill (H. R. 2061) for the relief of Ernest O. Robinette and others was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JUNIUS ALEXANDER

The bill (H. R. 2074) for the relief of Junius Alexander was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIM OF E. DEVLIN, INC.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2126) authorizing the Comptroller General of the United States to adjust and settle the claim of E. Devlin, Inc.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the case is rather unusual, and he is fully justified in asking for an explanation.

The bill was recommended by the Acting Comptroller General. The firm of E. Devlin, Inc., had charge of the burial service and furnished the necessary attention and supplies for one who at the time was thought to be a soldier. He had been down on the Mexican border. I believe he had entered the Federal service. Upon examination he was found unfit, and received an honorable discharge. The Devlin Co. sent a telegram to the proper authorities in Washington asking whether or not he was qualified to receive burial as a veteran. There was an error in transmitting the telegram to the Devlin Co. The Veterans' Administration said he was not qualified, but the telegram was delivered saying that he was qualified. The Devlin Co. went ahead and did the work, for which there was a charge of only $100. The Comptroller General sent the bill to the Congress and recommended that it be passed.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of E. Devlin, Inc., for its services and expenses incurred in connection with the preparation of the body and the interment of the late Wallace C. Marietta, and to allow in full and final settlement of such claim an amount not to exceed the sum of $100. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of the claim: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

ANNA H. ROSA

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1448) for the relief of Anna H. Rosa, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after "$30", to insert "in full settlement of all claims against the United States", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Anna H. Rosa, of East Providence, R. I., the sum of $30, in full settlement of all claims against the United States for damages to her automobile caused by snow falling from the roof of the customhouse at Providence, R. I.: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. E. BOSTROM

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1812) for the relief of A. E. Bostrom, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment at the end of the bill to add a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to A. E. Bostrom, of De Smet, S. Dak., the sum of $309, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States on account of the loss of certain personal property which was destroyed by fire on January 23, 1935, at Onigum, Minn., while said claimant was temporarily employed by the Indian Service as a physician: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNCREST ORCHARDS, INC.

The bill (S. 927) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims, to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Suncrest Orchards, Inc., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Suncrest Orchards, Inc., against the United States for damages for the alleged wrongful seizure of certain fruit shipped in interstate commerce during the year 1926.

SEC. 2. Such claim may be instituted at any time within 2 years after the passage of this act, notwithstanding the lapse of time or any statute of limitations. Proceedings in any suit before the Court of Claims under this act, and appeals therefrom, and payment of any judgment thereon, shall be had as in the case of claims over which such court has jurisdiction under section 145 of the Judicial Code as amended.

BORG-WARNER CORPORATION

The bill (S. 755) to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of the Borg-Warner Corporation was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the bill with respect to which the Senator from Utah has asked for an explanation does nothing more nor less than is indicated in the title on the calendar. The purpose of the bill is merely to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of the Borg-Warner Corporation.

As I understand, the Borg-Warner Corporation has its principal place of business in the city of Chicago. The claim has been pending for some time. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Utah that all the bill provides is the right to appear before the Court of Claims and present evidence as to whether or not the claim should be allowed.

Mr. KING. How much is the claim, and when did it arise?

Mr. LUCAS. Without referring to my files, I cannot tell the Senator from Utah the exact amount of the claim. I am unable to say when the claim arose without going to my office and obtaining the information from my files. If the Senator desires that information and wishes to have the bill go over, I have no objection. I shall be glad to furnish the information requested.

Mr. KING. I may say to the Senator that in many cases claims which are stale, many years of age, are resurrected, and it is said, "Well, let it go to the Court of Claims and let the Court of Claims pass upon it." Many of those claims are invalid.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be glad next week to furnish the information the Senator desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SIGVARD C. FORO

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1092) for the relief of Sigvard C. Foro, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$4,722" and insert "$3,621.75", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money appropriated or allocated for the maintenance and operation of the Civilian Conservation Corps, to Sigvard C. Foro, of Duluth, Minn., the sum of $3,621.75, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for personal injuries and property damages sustained by him when his car was struck by a Civilian Conservation Corps truck on Highway No. 61 at Palmer, Minn., on August 5, 1937: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with such claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with such claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1449) for the relief of Robert Stockman was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee requests an explanation of the bill.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

W. B. TUCKER ET AL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1372) for the relief of W. B. Tucker, Helen W. Tucker, Lonie Meadows, and Susie Meadows, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$11,511.05" and insert "$3,511.05", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to W. B. Tucker the sum of $3,511.05, to Helen W. Tucker the sum of $1,475.70, to Lonie Meadows the sum of $546.29, and to Susie Meadows the sum of $1,192.68, all residents of Louisburg, N. C., in full settlement of any and all claims for personal injuries, medical expenses, and property damage suffered by them as a result of an automobile accident which occurred on North Carolina State Highway 56 on June 9, 1936, when the automobile in which they were riding was struck by a truck owned by the United States Soil Conservation Service and operated by one John W. Prather, an employee of the Soil Conservation Service: Provided, That no part of amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 4087) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as amended by the act of June 4, 1920, so as to confer on the commanding general, General Headquarters Air Force, the same retirement privileges now enjoyed by chiefs of branches, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let us have an explanation of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah requests an explanation.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

THE SENATE PRESS GALLERY

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 117) to amend paragraph 2 of rule XXXIV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules with an amendment, on page 1, line 11, after the word "radio", to insert "wire", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That paragraph 2 of rule XXXIV of the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended by striking out the last sentence of said paragraph 2 and substituting in lieu thereof the following: "They shall make such regulations respecting the reporters' galleries of the Senate, together with the adjoining rooms and facilities, as will confine their occupancy and use to bona fide reporters for daily newspapers, to bona fide reporters of news or press associations requiring telegraph service to their membership, and to bona fide reporters for daily news dissemination through radio, wire, wireless, and similar media of transmission. These regulations shall so provide for the use of such space and facilities as fairly to distribute their use to all such media of news dissemination."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish the Senator who sponsored or originally offered the resolution would explain it.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, this resolution was offered at the request of a number of agencies that were desirous of having the regulations of the Senate changed so as to admit certain news disseminating agencies to the press gallery. The present standing rule of the Senate places the authority for the adoption of the regulations concerning the press gallery in the Rules Committee, but with a very definite limitation that the use of the gallery must be confined to bona fide reporters gathering news for daily newspapers. There is no authority to open the galleries to press associations, such as the Associated Press, the United Press, and the representatives of other press associations nor to the representatives of radio agencies which gather news for daily dissemination. In order to enable the Rules Committee to consider a change in the regulations it was necessary, in the opinion of the Rules Comittee, to amend the standing rule so as to provide, as will be done if the resolution shall be adopted, that the Rules Committee may make regulations concerning the press gallery, with the limitation that it must be confined to reporters gathering news for daily dissemination to newspapers, to reporters gathering news for press associations, and to reporters gathering daily news not for comment but for dissemination through radio, wireless, and other facilities.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Do I understand correctly the Senator to say that under the present rule the Associated Press and other press associations cannot have representatives in the press gallery?

Mr. GILLETTE. They do have.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; they do have.

Mr. GILLETTE. I will say to the majority leader they have their representatives in the press gallery, but it is by sufferance.

Mr. BARKLEY. Who suffers—the Members of the Senate?

Mr. GILLETTE. I do not know who suffers from it, but the definite limitation of the rule at the present time is that the Rules Committee may make regulations for the use of the gallery, strictly limiting it to reporters representing daily newspapers not more than one seat to each newspaper.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with the Senator that if the news-gathering associations are not permitted really under the rule to be represented in the press gallery, the rule ought to be amended.

Mr. GILLETTE. That is the opinion of the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. It had never been called to my attention that they were in the gallery by sufferance. Certainly they are entitled to the same consideration as are individual reporters for daily newspapers. As a matter of fact, many of them supply the bulk of the news from Washington to newspapers represented also by individual reporters.

Mr. GILLETTE. I will say to the Senator that I am sure there is no disposition on the part of anybody to take advantage of the press associations. That question arose with the application of the representatives of certain news-gathering and radio news-disseminating agencies. When the matter was considered by a subcommittee, it was found that it was advisable to amend the standing rule, and it was suggested at the same time that when the limitation was enlarged to include possibly radio representatives, we correct definitely the present defect in the rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand, the radio news commentators or reporters at certain hours during the day and night disseminate news that under the present situation they have to gather largely from newspapers which they read prior to their news reports——

Mr. GILLETTE. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Whereas under the proposed amendment to the rule the Rules Committee can consider whether it will permit representatives of various radio news-gathering services to occupy seats in the galleries as well as the newspaper reporters.

Mr. GILLETTE. That is a correct statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment suggested does not itself automatically dispose of the question at all?

Mr. GILLETTE. Not at all. It simply gives the Rules Committee the authority to take action if they think it is wise and desirable.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me, in view of the change in the news-gathering situation in the country and in the world, there is nothing improper not only in correcting the technical mistake which it seems to me must have been not intentional in barring the news-gathering associations such as the Associated Press, the United Press, and the International News, and others, but at the same time giving the committee power to consider the matter of radio news reporters as well.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Can the Senator advise us whether or not the rule now permits reporters such as columnists who report and disseminate news entirely for their own gain and not for any particular paper, to use the facilities of the press gallery?

Mr. GILLETTE. The language of the present standing rule is that regulations may be made subject to the limitation that the use of gallery must be confined to reporters disseminating news for daily newspapers. It has been enlarged, as I have said, largely by sufferance and sometimes by action of the Rules Committee, regardless of that limitation. For instance, the Associated Press, I believe, at the present time has 75 members of the gallery. The standing rule limits the privilege to one reporter for each daily newspaper.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does it permit columnists who are selling or syndicating their columns to have the privileges of the press gallery?

Mr. GILLETTE. The present rule does not.

Mr. McCARRAN. Then by what authority have columnists been in the press gallery?

Mr. GILLETTE. I will say to the Senator that the committee has studied this matter for a number of weeks. It was almost impossible to find out how the situation had developed from 1834. One gentleman, a member of a press association, has painstakingly investigated it. We have consulted with the Parliamentarian. We could go back to the proceedings of the Rules Committee and find perhaps where they had taken some action about 1884. But the standing rule very definitely limits the privilege of the press gallery. There is a standing committee of correspondents that is set up and selected by the members of the press gallery, who have done a very wonderful work in connection with it. I might suggest to Senators that in the report of the committee is embodied a synopsis of the development of this whole situation, on which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] and I collaborated, feeling that it was very important.

Mr. McCARRAN. I should like to ask the Senator one more question. Does the Rules Committee now contemplate, or has the question been discussed by the committee, that those who write syndicated articles and who are known generally as columnists may come under such amendment as may be proposed by the pending resolution?

Mr. GILLETTE. I cannot answer that question directly. So far as I know that matter was not discussed. The inception of the present rule was discussed in the committee as was the enlargement of the rule for the purpose of including radio representatives. Then the whole question developed and we thought it was necessary to amend the standing rule.

Mr. McCARRAN. I propound a last question. Having in mind that there are today columnists who are writing the news and giving it out through syndicated articles, who are disseminating the news perhaps more widely and more intelligently than might be expected from the ordinary, everyday reporter, it seems to me that some consideration should be given them. While we are giving consideration to those who represent the radio and who speak through the radio, we should also give consideration to those who are in reality disseminating the news through syndicated columns in the various newspapers of the country.

Mr. GILLETTE. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. I am sure the Rules Committee will consider it very carefully.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, my interest was aroused during the explanation of the resolution by a statement which I thought the Senator made concerning the proposed amendment, namely, that it would permit the representatives of various radio agencies to use the facilities of the press gallery, or at least permit the Rules Committee to pass on whether they should be represented in the press gallery, but I thought the Senator said something about a further restriction or limitation as to their gathering news without comment.

Mr. GILLETTE. No; I am sure the Senator misunderstood me. There was no intention on my part to suggest a restriction of comment. The proposed amendment simply places on the other agencies the limitation that the present rule places on the reporters for the daily newspapers.

Mr. HATCH. The same limitation would apply to all?

Mr. GILLETTE. The same limitation would apply to all.

Mr. HATCH. That is the point I desired to bring out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 5324) to amend the National Housing Act, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

J. J. GREENLEAF

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 527) for the relief of J. J. Greenleaf, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, at the beginning of line 6, to strike out "of all claims against" and insert "of the balance due from"; on line 7, after the name "Greenleaf", to insert "of Richmond, Ky."; on line 8, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$50,000" and insert "14,875"; on page 2, line 3, after the word "which", to strike out "employed" and insert "employment"; and at the end of the bill to add a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and in full settlement of the balance due from the Government of the United States, to J. J. Greenleaf, of Richmond, Ky., the sum of $14,875 for services rendered to the Government of the United States by J. J. Greenleaf pursuant to his employment to represent the Government of the United States in certain litigation, which employment is evidenced by a letter addressed to him by the Honorable Homer S. Cummings, the Attorney General of the United States, on August 9, 1935, which employment was enlarged by letter of August 23, 1935, addressed to him by George C. Sweeney, Assistant Attorney General: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I notice that the Attorney General recommends the passage of the bill with a reduced amount. That is a matter to which I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky address himself.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am very glad to explain the bill. It was referred to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] as a subcommittee. He went into it most extensively, held hearings, and reached the conclusion that the amount as carried in the bill was not sufficient to pay for the actual services which Mr. Greenleaf rendered.

I may say to the Senator from Tennessee that Mr. Greenleaf came to Washington because Mr. Woodson, of Kentucky, had been appointed Alien Property Custodian. Mr. Greenleaf did not care about coming, but Mr. Woodsan wanted a friend to advise him. When that activity was transferred to the Department of Justice Mr. Greenleaf went with it for a while. He stayed on for a few months, when he resigned and went home, after he had made some effort to prepare the cases which he was afterward employed as a special Assistant Attorney General to look after. He received a letter from the Attorney General asking if he would conduct certain cases, known as the Cattle Tick cases, and he agreed to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I understand the Sentor, that was after Mr. Greenleaf had received regular employment by the year.

Mr. LOGAN. Oh, yes. He resigned and went home. A judgment for $600,000 was secured against the Government, and for 29 months Mr. Greenleaf gave practically all his time to the trial of these cases. There were 22 parties and 3 separate cases.

I thought, and the Senator from Michigan thought, that the amount Mr. Greenleaf should receive should be more than we are allowing him, because the Attorney General wrote to Mr. Greenleaf and said that after the services were over he would pay him a reasonable fee. Mr. Greenleaf filed an affidavit from the most outstanding lawyers in Kentucky, and perhaps from some other places, pointing out that a reasonable fee for the services rendered would be $50,000 or $60,000, but under a law enacted by Congress the Department cannot pay a special assistant more than at the rate of $10,000 a year. Because of that law the Senator from Michigan reported to our committee that all Mr. Greenleaf could receive was about $21,000, of which some $7,000 had been paid; and the Senator from Michigan recommended to the committee, and we accepted the recommendation, that $14,000 be appropriated, which is all we thought we could appropriate under the law.

I believe that substantially states the facts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF JOSEPH MIHELICH

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 920) for the relief of Mary Mihelich, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the United States District Court for the District of Montana to hear, determine, and render judgment, as if the United States were suable in tort, upon the claim of the estate of Joseph Mihelich, for damages sustained as a result of the death of Joseph Mihelich, who was killed at Butte, Mont., on July 2, 1938, by the caving in of a sewer ditch which had been dug by employees of the Works Progress Administration: Provided, That the judgment, if any, shall not exceed $5,000.

SEC. 2. Suit upon such claim may be instituted at any time within 1 year after the enactment of this act, notwithstanding the lapse of time or any statute of limitations. Proceedings for the determination of such claims, appeals therefrom, and payment of any judgment thereon shall be in the same manner as in the cases over which such court has jurisdiction under the provisions of paragraph 20 of section 24 of the Judicial Code, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the District of Montana to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of the estate of Joseph Mihelich."

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 34) for the relief of W. K. Richardson was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let us have an explanation of the joint resolution. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

DOMICILIARY CARE, ETC., FOR CERTAIN VETERANS

The bill (H. R. 2320) to provide domiciliary care, medical and hospital treatment, and burial benefits to certain veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, and the Boxer Rebellion, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to persons entitled to domiciliary care, medical and hospital treatment, and burial benefits under the provisions of sections 6 and 17, Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, as amended (U. S. C., title 38, secs. 706 and 717), and regulations issued pursuant thereto, as amended, those persons recognized as veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and Philippine Insurrection, under public laws in effect on March 19, 1933, are hereby included within the provisions of the aforesaid section 6, as amended, and the second proviso of the aforesaid section 17, and regulations issued pursuant thereto, as amended, in the same manner and to the same extent as the provisions are now or may hereafter be applied to veterans of any war as specified therein.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 190) to authorize the temporary appointment of a special judge for the District Court of the Virgin Islands was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over. That completes the calendar.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY, AND AUTHORITY FOR TRANSACTION OF CERTAIN BUSINESS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate shall conclude its business today it stand in adjournment until noon on Thursday next, and that during the interim the Vice President shall be authorized to sign bills and resolutions, that committees may report bills, resolutions, and nominations, and that the Secretary of the Senate may receive communications from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

STATE OF VERMONT

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution No. 11, Calendar No. 208, directing the Comptroller General to readjust the account between the United States and the State of Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to audit the claim of the State of Vermont with respect to advances and expenditures made by such State for military purposes during the War of 1812–15, with Great Britain, and after applying the rules of evidence and settlement to this class of claims, provided for in resolution of May 14, 1836 (5 Stat. L. 132), and in section 12 of the act approved March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. L. 229), to submit to the Senate a report containing the results of an audit of such claim, in conformity with said rules, and to certify to Congress for an appropriation the balance found due the State of Vermont.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I shall not occupy the time of the Senate longer than to state, just prima facie, the purpose of the bill.

The bill provides for the adjustment of a claim by the State of Vermont against the United States, based upon expenditures, and the interest on those expenditures, made for the United States in its national defense in the War of 1812–15.

The legal foundation for the claim is statutes passed by the Federal Government from 1814 to 1818 promising definitely and specifically to pay this type of claim. A part of the claim is noninterest bearing. That is to say, $35,057.78, as ascertained by the Comptroller General under a resolution formerly passed by the Senate, is noninterest bearing. The interest all arises over the amount of $4,130 of a loan obtained by the State of Vermont, to carry which it paid interest, and which it reloaned or expended for the benefit of the United States Government.

As ascertained to the date of February 19, 1935, the sum of these items of principal and the interest thereon is $92,868.90. It makes me blush to think that I have had to ask the Senate time after time to consider this just and legal claim. It is so insignificant in amount as compared with the other claims that pass the Senate without any difficulty whatever that I really marvel at the idea that I am forced to put on pressure to have this claim allowed.

The bill itself does not allow the claim. It does not appropriate money for the payment of the claim. It makes an arrangement for the Comptroller General to bring the calculation up to date, and to have the authority to do so from the entire Congress, so that the Budget Bureau may consider the matter and the item may be put into an appropriation bill at some time in the future. We hope some day to have this just claim paid to the State of Vermont, and I now leave the matter for my kind friend from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] to state his objection, which heretofore has been repeatedly urged here.

I may say that similar bills have twice been referred to the Judiciary Committee and approved, and passed by the Senate, but they were held up in the House for lack of expedition in the consideration of bills on the calendar. A third time a bill for this purpose was referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and favorably reported, and then referred to the Committee on Claims. The Senator from Nebraska was chairman of the subcommittee which considered the bill from that point of view, and reported unfavorably upon it. Now, for the fourth time, the measure has been favorably reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will entirely satisfy himself today regarding the bill and that the Senate itself will pass it.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator from Vermont. Does the direction to the Comptroller General to make an audit direct him to include advances which have been made to the State of Vermont by the Federal Government subsequent to that time? I mean, is there any direction to include what might be considered offsetting items?

Mr. AUSTIN. The direction is certainly ample to enable the Comptroller General to offset what legally ought to be offset against any claim. As a matter of fact, in the former calculation the Comptroller General offset certain sums of money that has been properly paid, and that ought to be offset. If there are any more such sums, let them be presented now. If the Senator from Colorado has anything to suggest that should be offset against this claim, let us hear from him now.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I had no suggestion to make. I was making an inquiry. I am merely conscious of the fact that in the case of Vermont and other States loans and advances have been made to the States for relief purposes within the last 6 or 8 years, and I was merely inquiring whether or not the joint resolution would provide for a general audit of the accounts of the States.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if the State of Vermont borrows any money from the United States, the United States will not have to offset it in order to get it. The State of Vermont has always paid its bills "on the nail," and the State of Vermont expects the United States to pay it what the United States owes the State of Vermont. That is all it asks.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, there is a great deal more to the point raised by the Senator from Colorado than is disclosed by the laudatory remarks of the Senator from Vermont for his native State. The basis of the pending claim is that at a time 122 years ago the State of Vermont incurred some expenditures in performing what is considered a Federal function; that is, providing for national defense. This action occurred in the War of 1812. The State was defending itself, but under our theory the National Government bears the expense of such activities. Now, after the lapse of 122 years, the Senator from Vermont says that the money Vermont spent in defending itself, with interest on all items subject to interest, should be repaid; and considerably more than half of the total amount of the claim represents interest.

As I understand, the point raised by the Senator from Colorado is that particularly in the last few years—and we need not go back beyond that period—the Federal Government has been doing in Vermont and for Vermont citizens things which ought to be done by the State for itself, has been incurring expenditures in providing for relief, in making contributions toward the erection of public works in the State of a strictly local nature, and, I venture to say, without having checked the figures, that within the last 5 years the Federal Government has incurred expenditures for Vermont which ought to have been paid by Vermont itself, running as high as a hundred times the amount of the claim now presented. That, in a way, forms the basis of my objection to this type of legislation.

Beyond that, however, is the question of the age of the claim. According to the Comptroller General's report, in 1817 the State of Vermont loaned $4,130, and in 1818, $6,000. Those dates, however, the Comptroller points out, are merely supplied. The loans were in connection with the War of 1812, and the records do not show the exact dates, so he puts in those approximate dates.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understood the Senator from Nebraska to say that, in addition to the loans, some expenditures were made directly by the State for military purposes.

Mr. BURKE. There were actual military expenditures amounting to $35,000.

Mr. CONNALLY. Were those expenditures made for defensive measures? Was the State invaded? Or were the expenditures made for offensive measures, to aid general prosecution of the war? Is the Senator prepared to answer that question?

Mr. BURKE. The State of Vermont feared invasion from the North. The State incurred military expenditures as a part of the general program, but also to aid in protecting itself from invasion.

My main objection to the pending measure is that it reaches back into the musty past and brings forth a claim which might with some reason have been presented immediately following the War of 1812; but to bring it up at this time, in a new century, 122 years later, seems to me straining altogether too far the matter of burdens which should be put upon the Federal Government.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether it is not true that Vermont really deserves considerable credit for these actions, which evidenced its loyalty to the Union during the War of 1812, at a time when very responsible and high influences in a large section of New England were holding the Hartford convention, and threatening to secede and join Canada in a new government. I think the test of Vermont's loyalty was the expenditure of some of its money, which is pretty good proof that she was loyal, and it seems to me that she deserves special credit for standing by the Union in 1812 and 1814, when there were disloyal elements in many sections of New England.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit——

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to thank the Senator from the Lone Star State for his recognition of a characteristic of his own great State. Vermont did not excel other States in patriotism and in loyalty; but Vermont was loyal, though she takes no special credit for that.

I want the Senator from Nebraska to have full opportunity to tell the Senate, if he knows it is so, that Vermont's delay in presenting this claim to the United States is not due to any laches on Vermont's part; it is due, in part, to the fact that not until 1921 did the Federal Government set up any agency or provide any means by which to get such a claim as this allowed by the Federal Government. Thereupon Vermont commenced the effort to have her claim allowed. I will not take the time of the Senator from Nebraska further, but I want the Senator from Texas to know that I appreciate his great courtesy to the State of Vermont.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I concede at this point that if the Senator from Vermont is to carry out the program of welcoming congratulatory messages from Texas and other States on the loyalty of Vermont 122 years ago, eventually there may be very few votes against the pending measure. [Laughter.] For myself, I think Vermont is entitled to credit for its loyalty, but not credit which can be measured in dollars and cents. I put the credit I give to Vermont upon a much higher plane than that. I also think that Vermont has been repaid manifold by being permitted to be a member of a union of free States during the century and a quarter that has elapsed since that unfortunate affair.

In answer to another point raised by the Senator from Vermont, that it was not until 1921 that the Federal Government set up an agency which would make it possible to examine into claims of this kind, I am sure the Senator from Vermont would not want the implication to be conveyed by his remarks that no claims of this general nature were submitted and paid prior to 1921. Such claims have been paid through all the years. It is true an agency was set up in 1921 which made it possible to determine such claims in a more orderly and scientific manner; but there was no reason whatever why in 1819, 1820, and every year down through the century and a quarter since the claim accrued, Vermont could not have presented this claim to Congress and asked for its allowance.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the pending claim does not stand alone. Allow this claim, and every Senator in this body will be obliged to consider whether his duty and obligation to his own State or city may not be such as to require him to bring forward claims running back even beyond the War of 1812. In fact, a measure is now pending before the Committee on Claims calling for the payment of about $3,000,000 to claimants whose claims, if they have any, arose during the period 1793 to 1799. There is also pending, and on a number of occasions it has been passed by the Senate, but fortunately not by the House of Representatives, a bill for the settlement of a claim of the city of Baltimore for about $200,000 because during the Civil War, when it was thought that a different outcome than that which occurred might take place at Gettysburg, and General Lee might be sweeping down on Washington, it was deemed advisable to throw up breastworks around the city of Baltimore. Baltimore did that, and paid the laborers who did the work, and Baltimore has had a claim pending at each session of the Congress for repayment of the amount expended, with interest.

I may say that the State of Connecticut has on some occasions, not, however, through the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY], presented a claim also growing out of the War of 1812.

The city of New York has a very large claim, approximating a million dollars, I believe, for expenditures which it claims it incurred on behalf of the Federal Government during the Civil War.

I have no doubt that almost every community in the United States can unearth some kind of a claim which it could, with just as much reason, present. It seems to me the Senate ought now to establish as a hard and fast rule that it will not go back 120 years, or 50 years, or 25 years, but will impose a reasonable limitation under which any State or city or community which has a valid claim must present it within 5, or 6, or 10 years, at the most.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. I ask the Senator from Nebraska if he stated that the State of Connecticut ever received an allowance on account of the War of 1812?

Mr. BURKE. Not to my knowledge; but a claim was presented at the last session of Congress, and reported adversely by the Committee on Claims, proposing to pay the State of Connecticut several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. DANAHER. Was the claim presented in the Senate?

Mr. BURKE. The claim was presented in the Senate, and referred first to the Committee on the Judiciary, along with the claim of the State of Vermont and that of the city of Baltimore and that of the city of New York, and then the claims were, upon motion, taken away from the Committee on the Judiciary and referred to the Committee on Claims, and a subcommittee was appointed to study them all very carefully. The junior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH], myself, and one other Senator were on that subcommittee. We studied the claim of the State of Connecticut and the other three claims and reported them adversely to the full Committee on Claims. The full committee sustained our report, and the claims were reported adversely to the Senate and stood upon the Senate calendar all during the remainder of the last session with the adverse report of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DANAHER. Since the Senator has acquitted the senior Senator from Connecticut of having presented that claim, I take it the same statement will apply to the present junior Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BURKE. The claim was presented by former Senator Lonergan in all good faith, just as I accord to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] the utmost of good faith in now presenting Vermont's claim. There is much to be said in favor of the position he takes. Congress has through all the years allowed a great many of these claims to different States, but the fact that what seems to be a wrong policy has been pursued in the past hardly affords justification now for continuing it indefinitely; indeed, I believe it was the Senator from Vermont who called my attention to the fact that my own State of Nebraska presented a claim to Congress for expenses incurred in the Indian wars, and I investigated that matter and found it was true. So far as the point I am making is concerned, however, it does not offer any obstacle to my course, because the claim was presented within 4 or 5 years, or 10 years at the utmost, from the time the expenditures were incurred, and was allowed and paid within that time.

So I say, Mr. President, that it would be a greatly mistaken policy now to go back into ancient history and give to these claimants, cities, States, and communities, the right to take these sums out of the already heavily overburdened Treasury of the United States. The Senator may say that the bill does not make any appropriation, but every Member of the Senate knows that it is the first step leading toward an appropriation that will surely follow. I have been unwilling that any of these matters should pass by unanimous consent. I think there should be a record vote. If the Senate in its wisdom shall decide that it is willing to put the stamp of approval on such claims as this, I certainly have no objection; but I myself should want to go to the full length and suggest the absence of a quorum, and at least ask for a record vote before the matter is submitted, and I do now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Davis	Johnson, Calif.	Pittman
Andrews	Donahey	Johnson, Colo.	Reed
Ashurst	Downey	King	Russell
Austin	Ellender	La Follette	Schwartz
Bailey	Frazier	Lee	Schwellenbach

Chavez	Herring	Norris	Walsh
Clark, Idaho	Hill	Nye	Wheeler
Clark, Mo.	Holman	O'Mahoney	Wiley
Connally	Holt	Overton
Danaher	Hughes	Pepper

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, there is only one subject about which I care to say anything further, and that is the subject of the claim of laches on the part of the State of Vermont.

Laches is something entirely different from limitations. I think no Member of this body would interpose the statute of limitations upon a debt as between two sovereign nations. Is any Senator willing to assert that the plea of limitation of time is good on the part of Germany or Great Britain as against our debt? Oh, no.

It must be admitted that the debt in question is a straight, honest debt owed by the United States to the State of Vermont, as to which there is no question about the consideration. It was money paid "on the nail" in time of trouble, partly in consideration of patriotism, to be sure, but also paid under Federal statutes promising repayment and interest thereon.

There might be something to the claim of laches on the part of the State if the State of Vermont had by its act misled the United States in any way, to the detriment of the United States, beween the time of contracting the debt and the present time. What do the facts appear to be in this relationship? Following the rendering of the service and the payment of the money by the State of Vermont there was a long period when no special provision was made for establishing this claim or any other similar claim; and many such claims which were presented failed for lack of a suitable medium for the establishment of the claims or for lack of proper evidence to prove the claims.

It was not until 1836 that the Federal statute was passed enabling some of the creditors to present their claims. In 1836 a joint resolution was passed "to authorize the Secretary of War to receive additional evidence in support of the claims of Massachusetts and other States of the United States for disbursements, services, and so forth, during the late war," meaning the same war with which we are dealing—the War of 1812. In that resolution there was this concluding sentence——

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. There was a little confusion, and I did not hear the year when the joint resolution was passed. I was not certain whether it was 1836 or 1936.

Mr. AUSTIN. Eighteen hundred and thirty-six. The concluding sentence of the joint resolution is as follows:

And that in the settlement of claims of other States upon the United States for services, disbursements, and expenditures during the late war with Great Britain, the same kind of evidence, vouchers, and proof shall be received as is herein provided for in relation to the claim of Massachusetts, the validity of which shall be, in like manner, determined and acted upon by the Secretary of War.

At that time the State authorities had in contemplation the presentation of the claim by the State, and they began to collect vouchers and enter them in a book in order to preserve them of record. I understand that such a book was completed by the 7th of November 1856. That date is ascertained from a certificate in the book itself. The certificate is as follows:

STATE OF VERMONT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Montpelier, November 7, 1856.

I certify that the foregoing 137 pages of this book contain true copies, in dates and amounts of the original vouchers in this office, for payments made by this State for services in the War of A. D. 1812 with Great Britain; and that the aggregate as appears by this book has been compared with the preceding vouchers and is correct.

In testimony whereof I hereunto set my hand and the seal of this State, this 7th day of November A. D. 1856.

[SEAL] CHARLES W. WILLARD,
Secretary of State.

In 1857 a fire occurred, and it was believed that all evidence of the claim by the State of Vermont against the United States was destroyed. I understand this book was found a long time afterward in the adjutant general's office. The book was discovered, or duplicate originals of the entries were found, many years afterward.

In 1921 Congress approved the so-called Budget Act, by which the General Accounting Office was set up, and provision was made for the presentation of these claims. Thereupon Vermont's claim began to be presented, and old records in the House, which I have seen, show that efforts were made forthwith, and from that time to this, with but little interruption, not caused by the State itself, to establish its claim. The State has tried to establish its claim, have it allowed, appropriated for, and paid.

Mr. President, I claim that even in a court of justice, where a litigant is held down to a legal basis for his right of recovery, Vermont could never, never be convicted of laches in respect to the presentation of its claim. The rules in a court of justice are more stringent than they ought to be in this court. This court ought to be a court of conscience, doing right as between two sovereigns, even though there might be some technical disability in the presentation of the claim or in the time of its presentation.

Let us see just what the courts hold to be laches. I read from page 7 of the report a citation which purports to be copied from a case involving a claim for interest by a State against the Federal Government:

Laches is not, like limitation, a mere matter of time but principally a question of the inequity of presenting the claim to be enforced, an inequity founded upon some change in the condition or relation of the property of the parties (Galliher v. Cadwell, 145 U. S. R. 368). The doctrine is based upon grounds of public policy, which requires for the peace of society the discouragement of stale demands. It is most applicable where the difficulty of doing entire justice arises through the death of the principal participants in the transaction complained of, or of the witnesses, or by reason of the original transaction having become so obscured by time as to render the ascertainment of the exact facts impossible (Hammond v. Hopkins, 143 U. S. R. 224).

Mr. President, the joint resolution calls for the ascertainment of the exact facts. It provides for the submission of the claim of the State of Vermont to the Comptroller General for auditing, for the purpose of having the amount ascertained by the General Accounting Office, put into the Budget of another year, appropriated for, and paid.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say at the present time. I understand that the Senator from Nebraska has called for a yea-and-nay vote, and I join in that request.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, it seems to me beyond question that in this matter Vermont was acting on behalf of the Union, on behalf of its territorial integrity, and against a possible invasion. In reality, she was participating in the national defense. She feared invasion from Canada, not only an invasion of Vermont but an invasion also of the United States; and the Union, therefore, is in honor bound to reimburse her for what she expended in military activities on behalf of the United States.

Furthermore, Mr. President, a just debt remains a just debt, no matter how old, and it is well known that the statutes of limitations do not apply to sovereignty.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I first wish to express entire concurrence with one of the points made by the Senator from Vermont; namely, that the question should be determined as it would be determined in a court of conscience. It should not be treated upon the basis of strict legal rules. I would not, as a Member of the Senate, think that we should act upon the basis of the statute of limitations. There are certain elements of conscience, however, that lead me to an opposite conclusion.

I am somewhat amazed to find the claim presented on the ground of conscience, and especially when we take into consideration things which have happened during the past 6 or 8 years. Here is a claim based upon loans and upon services rendered during the War of 1812. There is no contention as to their validity; I do not assume that there is any question as to the amount; but, from the standpoint of conscience, 7 or 8 years ago when distress prevailed throughout this land, including the State of Vermont, one of the first things that was done was the passage of an act, sponsored by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the then Senator from Colorado, Mr. Costigan, appropriating $300,000,000, which was loaned to the States. It was not given but was loaned to the States, allocated and apportioned to the States, to enable them to provide for their necessities, to enable them to defend themselves against the depression. Since then endless millions of dollars have been appropriated by the Federal Government to aid in carrying the relief burdens of all the States, including the great State of Vermont. So, if we are going to talk about conscience, there is an element of conscience in the consideration whether or not a State is justified, in its conscience, after receiving this help of recent years in vastly greater amounts than the total of its claim, to come to Congress and ask to have paid an old claim.

The Federal Government has built in Vermont, in Colorado, and elsewhere schoolhouses; it has built hospitals; it has built courthouses; it has built roads out of Federal moneys in order to assist in carrying the burdens which were primarily those of the State governments. I stood on the floor not many weeks ago and urged an appropriation of several million dollars to aid the New England States relieve themselves from the effects of a destructive hurricane. I think some $5,000,000 was appropriated for their aid. That was done just as a matter of good conscience, the Federal Government making no claim because of the great aid and help it has rendered and the burdens it has carried. So I ask, Is this claim to be sustained upon the ground of good conscience?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am always delighted with the philosophy and good sense of the able Senator from Colorado, but does he think that the amount of benefit payments by the Federal Government to the State should be considered an offset to claims of the kind now under consideration?

Mr. ADAMS. I am merely recalling one particular appropriation which was a loan. There was one appropriation of $300,000,000 which was sent to the States as a loan. My recollection is that a subsequent appropriation of $500,000,000 went partly as a loan and partly as a grant. Expenditures since then have not been in the shape of loans. However, I was merely discussing the one question of good conscience as between two sovereignties and whether or not one should exact the letter of the bond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution be engrossed and read a third time?

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. BURKE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass? [Putting the question.] By the sound, the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BURKE. I ask for a division.

On a division, the joint resolution was passed.

THE NEUTRALITY ENTANGLEMENT

Mr. NYE obtained the floor.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me for a few observations?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate has before it a number of bills dealing with the broad subject of neutrality. A number of witnesses have appeared before the committee and expressed their views upon these measures. There has been no unanimity of opinion upon the part of those who have testified—indeed, as I understand the testimony, there have been rather violent disagreements. That is to be expected, because when there are international conflicts in various parts of the world, sound legislation dealing in a narrow or comprehensive way with neutrality—with the rights of neutrals and the rights of belligerents—is fraught with great difficulty—indeed, is almost impossible.

In my opinion this is not a propitious moment to enact measures which deal in a narrow or comprehensive way with the problem of neutrality. There are well-recognized principles of international law which obtain during days of peace as well as during periods of war. If international law is to be supplemented by municipal laws and regulations adopted by one or more nations, then such enactments, rules, and regulations should, so far as possible, originate during periods of comparative peace. It is difficult to deal with neutrality when there are serious conflicts, particularly among important and powerful nations. This is especially true in this period of the world's history, when nations are drawn more closely together through trade and commerce and through improved methods of communication and transportation. As we know, many nations depend largely for their prosperity upon international trade. The seas are covered with vessels carrying commodities from all lands, and whenever any conflict arises among nations international trade is seriously affected. Interference with trade and commerce upon land and sea inevitably results when nations are at war. So, as I have indicated, it is a most difficult task—indeed, it taxes the genius and ability of the greatest statesmen for the purpose of formulating neutrality measures. The rights of neutrals and the rights of belligerents are involved in any legislation which falls within the category of neutrality.

It was believed by some that the so-called Neutrality Act of May 1, 1937, which was defended with great zeal in this body, would prove beneficial in the solution of neutrality problems. I was one of the few Senators who opposed the bill, and in an address which I delivered in the Senate on Wednesday, April 21, 1937, I pointed out some of the reasons which impelled me to vote against its enactment. I indicated that the measure emphasized belligerent rights, but did not sufficiently indicate neutral rights and responsibilities in determining questions which might arise between neutrals and belligerents. I indicated that the measure seems to be lacking in realism, and that when international difficulties arose policies framed by nations for the purpose of determining national conduct with respect to those international questions would be disregarded.

It seemed to me then, as it does now, that in the event of international conflicts regulations which one nation may promulgate, hoping to prevent its being drawn into the conflict, would probably be ignored by belligerents if advantages might be derived by such course. If neutral rights are surrendered, it is not to be expected that belligerents will be more constrained to regard conceded neutral rights. Attempts to enumerate rights to be surrendered seems to require an enumeration of rights which are not surrendered. Belligerents are not concerned in the details of local legislation. They are at war and admit no restraints except grudgingly, and even then infringements are made upon international agreements.

It is doubtful that whether by yielding rights isolation could be obtained, or, if so, whether the situation would be satisfactory.

As I have indicated upon several occasions, our country has stood for neutral rights, freedom of the seas, and the right to carry on trade in wartimes as well as in peacetimes. It is true that some of these rights were either surrendered or their loss acquiesced in during the World War.

Perhaps no hard and fast rule can be laid down to govern national action when the circumstances in which that action is taken are unpredictable. If we bar our citizens from travel or its ships from sailing the seas or merchants from trading abroad, there would still be danger of involvement both through the probable action of the contestants or by reason of the probable opposition at home which might force a change of neutrality rules which we had adopted.

As I have indicated, the act of 1937 was so unsatisfactory I felt constrained to oppose it. I believe that in its operations it would help the strong nations, particularly those possessing large shipping interests, and would injure the weak nations, particularly those whose shipping interests were unimportant.

I was so much opposed to the measure that on January 5, 1938, I offered a bill for its repeal. The measure was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but no action was taken by the committee. I still persisted in my opposition to the measure, and on January 4 of this year I offered a similar measure calling for the repeal of the act of May 1, 1937. The latter bill is now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I hope that it will be given due consideration, and I shall be gratified if it meets the approval of the committee.

I shall not attempt to trespass any further upon the time of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], but before closing I desire to offer for the RECORD an article appearing in the New York Herald Tribune of this date, written by Mr. Walter Lippmann. The article is entitled "The Neutrality Entanglement." Mr. Lippmann, as all Senators know, is a writer of great ability. His views upon political, economic, and social questions are entitled to most serious consideration. I ask that Mr. Lippmann's article be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of April 25, 1939]

TODAY AND TOMORROW—THE NEUTRALITY ENTANGLEMENT

(By Walter Lippmann)

In trying to decide what to do about the Neutrality Act the members of the Senate committee have an extraordinarily difficult problem. Senator BORAH pointed out the difficulty last week when he asked whether it was not impossible for the committee to come "to any agreement which would be accepted as a neutral position." When he asked that question Mr. BORAH came closer to the heart of the real question than has anyone else who has taken part in the debate.

Mr. BORAH gave as his reason for the difficulty that "we," meaning American public opinion, "have practically passed upon who is an aggressor." Undoubtedly that is a great cause why it would now be difficult to have almost anything the Congress enacts "accepted as a neutral position." But the fundamental difficulty would exist if American public opinion were completely detached and morally indifferent on the issues in Europe and Asia. The essential difficulty confronting the committee is that it is compelled to legislate on neutrality at a time when a war is already being fought in Asia and at a time when all of Europe is in a state of warlike mobilization.

This means that Congress is compelled to change the rules of the game while the game is being played. Whatever it does or fails to do, the result will not be universally accepted as neutral. Senator NYE'S law has placed Congress in a quandary where Congress is compelled to take a position, and almost any position it takes will immediately and vitally affect the course of events all over the world, will be construed throughout the world by every nation as an act of American national policy.

Take the simplest case. Suppose Congress does nothing. Then on May 1, when section 2 expires, we shall have an embargo on munitions to belligerents, an embargo that is not being applied to Japan and China. Suppose that war breaks out in Europe. We shall then find ourselves supplying Japan, which is a partner of the axis, with munitions while we refuse them to Great Britain, France, and, if they are attacked, to Switzerland and the Netherlands. We shall be supplying munitions to the Asiatic partner of the axis while we are withholding them from the nations that were attacked.

Suppose, then, that Congress reenacts the whole of the existing law. In that event Congress will have reaffirmed so positively its insistence on the present act that the President would be morally bound to impose an embargo against Japan. The effect on Japan would be serious. The sudden change of policy in the midst of her war with China would be unneutral and would give Japan the strongest kind of provocation to make a military alliance with Germany and Italy and to strike, while the British are preoccupied in the Mediterranean, at the Dutch East Indies and the adjacent regions.

If Japan is pushed into the arms of Germany, the axis will not only have gained a powerful ally but, what is worse, the axis will have a strong inducement to go to war now in Europe. For by going to war, the axis can shut off the military supplies that are now moving from this country to England, France, and the Netherlands. The existing law, it must be remembered, permits exports of munitions in time of peace. It stops the exports only in wartime. Therefore, the law, as it is now framed, says that if Germany wants to stop the British and French from obtaining arms in the United States, Germany can do this by declaring war. This is a dangerous inducement to the war party at a time when the peace of the world is trembling in the balance.

Suppose then that Congress goes still further, enacts the Nye-Clark-Bone mandatory embargo. Where does that leave us? It also means an immediate embargo against Japan, followed almost surely by a Japanese military alliance with the axis, creating a situation in which there are the strongest inducements to a triple attack on Great Britain and France. For, having been deprived of American supplies, the Japanese, who are already at war, will have to move. The axis will have acquired a willing, even an urgent, ally, and at the same time it will be able to cut off the supply of munitions to the European democracies.

Suppose then that Congress takes the opposite line and revises the law so that supplies will not be sold to "the aggressor." This would compel Congress to declare a kind of war against Japan, and a kind of war is very likely to become a real war.

We are, no matter what we do, in a position where no one will regard the action of Congress as neutral, where everyone will see that it favors one nation at the expense of another. We need not have been in this entangling position. We have entangled ourselves by Mr. NYE'S legislation, and the only real way to disentangle ourselves is to repeal the legislation and take our stand once more on the principles of international law.

This is much the safest course, the most easily defensible, the most consistent with the sentiments and the interest of the American people. If we return to international law, we do not have to intervene in the Far East by changing our policy in the middle of the war. We do not have to challenge Japan at a time when Japan is inevitably in a desperate mood. We shall be able to take the neutral position, which is that Japan and China may buy supplies here in accordance with articles VII and VIII of the Hague Convention of 1907 on the Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers. We shall not be entangled in the extremely dangerous consequences that would result from applying an embargo in the middle of a war. We shall remove from Japan the provocation and the inducement to sign a military alliance with the axis and to precipitate a world war.

In regard to Germany and Italy, we shall be taking a position which is legally and morally unassailable. On the other hand, we shall take away from them the hideous inducement to start a war in order to deprive their opponents of supplies that they can obtain only as long as there is no war. The act of repeal, on the other hand, would not only remove the inducement to strike quick, which we now offer to the axis, but it would be profoundly deterrent because it would be construed as making it possible for the coalition to resist successfully.

Above all, repeal would protect the United States against finding itself in a horrible dilemma once war broke out. For then, with public sentiment what it is, with America's national interest what it is, we should at the outbreak of a war, after air raids on London and Paris and the overrunning of Holland and Switzerland, find ourselves compelled to refuse arms to the nations that engaged the overwhelming sympathy of the Nation.

The argument now being conducted before the committees of Congress is emotional enough. Imagine what it would be in the midst of war itself. If in the midst of war we refused to amend the act, a great majority of the people would be horrified at the idea that they were helping aggression to succeed. And if, acting on our sentiments and what many would regard as our vital interests, we then amended the act, we should for all practical purposes have intervened in the war.

The safest course, I repeat, is to repeal the act and return to the elementary principle of international law. This is the only solution that can still be adopted which is legally neutral and can therefore be defended; it is the only solution which can enable us to escape the worst of all the entanglements of a neutral, the entanglements of changing his policy after war breaks out.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have been more than a little disturbed by reason of the speed with which people have adopted two cries—one cry particularly, to the effect that the Neutrality Act has proven a failure. In my opinion, the Neutrality Act has one lone purpose, and that purpose is to help the United States keep out of other people's wars; and until there can be a demonstration of our involvement in other people's wars in spite of the existence of that act, I do not know by what right, by what rhyming, or by what reasoning anyone can fairly conclude that the Neutrality Act has been a failure.

Unprecedented is the speed with which people have recently adopted as their own the cry that if war comes to Europe our country cannot hope to stay out of that war. Many seem certain that a war in Europe makes our participation inevitable, inescapable. This sort of thinking is alarming, to say the least. It is the kind of thinking that most easily breaks down resistance to being drawn into the wars of other people, wars which would bring unbearable penalties upon our country and its citizens.

"We cannot escape part in it if war comes to Europe." Why does this thought persist and grow, when there is so much reason to believe that we can stay out of war if we but have the will to stay out? Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Switzerland, and Spain stayed out of the last war. They were 55,000,000 people, living in democracies at the very door of the war in Europe. If they could stay out of the last war, why can we not be sure of a prospect of staying out if war comes to Europe again—we who are 3,000 miles and more removed from the seat of war? Why must we even lend ourselves to the thought that we cannot stay out of another European war? One must naturally be left wondering as to the source of this feeling of inevitability. Are these opinions being planted by chance, by careful purpose? Are they inspired? Are we by any chance being thus early subjected to clever propaganda?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I do not want to digress too far from the Senator's remarks; but I was very much struck a few weeks ago in reading an article, which seemed to be a special article, in one of the newspapers here, in which some local newspaperman had interviewed a man named Warring, who was charged with attempting to bribe a jury, or something like that. The newspaperman went on and interviewed Warring; and during the course of the interview Warring said, "There comes a time in the life of every man when he must go to jail."

I was rather struck by the similarity between that remark and the attitude of many persons in this country. I have never figured out that I was going to jail, and I do not think more than 2 or 3 percent of the population figure that they are really going to jail; but I was struck with the similarity between that attitude and the attitude of many persons in the country that at regular intervals there come times when the country must go to war.

Mr. NYE. One is about as inevitable as the other, I should say; and I thank the Senator from Washington for his very striking example of how easily some persons can make themselves believe that this, that, and another course are inevitable.

I have asked if by any chance there might be a purpose of propaganda behind this feeling that persists and grows. It can fairly be said that the greatest danger to our peace in America is propaganda, from abroad and propaganda from home; influences that adopt No. 1 causes ahead of the cause of Americanism, and ahead of the cause of the security of our great country. If we can learn to expect this propaganda, and be prepared better to distinguish it when it is in evidence, we shall surely find ourselves much better prepared to avoid being devoured in other peoples' wars another time.

Today I make it my business to point to what may be expected in the way of foreign propaganda intended to invite our active interest in more of Europe's hates and wars. Propaganda there will be; that we may be sure; indeed, propaganda there is today. A few days ago the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] very forcefully remarked that whether or not the former Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, wanted to recognize it, nevertheless it is true that foreign propaganda is at work in the United States today. It does not matter in the least from which side it may come, the fact still remains that propaganda is not a good tonic for us. We are having it dished up to us by both sides involved in Europe today. There will be more of it; and I should like to plead with the Senate to be prepared for it and to be ready to define it.

An English writer has declared that while British propaganda was very successful during the World War, its success was in the end more largely traceable to the miserable failure of German propaganda. In the light of what I am about to suggest by way of information which I think the Senate should have, I am inclined to believe that, with all the blunders of Germany and her propaganda machine in 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917, they never did anything quite so brazen as is being done today by men in authority in Britain who are laying the foundation for the involvement of the United States in her next war, for whatever cause it may be.

At this point I desire to say that I have great sympathy with the expression which came yesterday from the lips of Gen. Hugh S. Johnson when he declared that he had no desire for the erection of a monument in his memory in Rome or in Berlin. Likewise he vowed that he was not interested in having a monument erected to him in London or in Paris. His words were well chosen; for there has been intent on the part of Americans—some of them great and leading Americans—to plant in the American mind the conclusion that anyone who fought against involvement in the European squabble was seeking or inviting the favor of one side or another engaged in the present European battle of words and propaganda.

I am not speaking today and I am not offering in evidence what I do offer in evidence because I think it will help or hurt any particular European cause. I offer it alone for the purpose it may serve in maintaining the one great democracy that exists and continues upon the earth. I want to call attention to the plans of one foreign country—plans cunningly laid—for our involvement in her next war.

If I were to charge openly the things that are going soon to appear in evidence, if I were to stand here and allege that this country and its propagandists intend to do this, that, and the other thing to America, Senators would be on their toes demanding to know what kind of authority could exist for such a contention. I say, Mr. President, these plans that are British to take the United States into Britain's next war, whatever the cause of that war may be, are unbelievable. If I were to stand here and say that Great Britain hopes that in her next war Japan will be opposed to her, Senators would rise and demand to know the authority for any such statement; but the truth of the matter is that Great Britain's minds today are anticipating that the one easy, sure way to involve the United States on the side of Britain in another war is to have Japan arrayed against Great Britain in that conflict. The easy way to get us into the next conflict that they think is coming is to have our alleged prejudices against the Japanese appealed to.

The authority I am about to quote today may be questioned. There has been published a series of works under the title "The Next War." One of the volumes in this series is entitled "Propaganda in the Next War." This particular volume was written by one Sidney Rogerson. I have been unable to obtain any trace of his background or of his connections; but the editor in chief of all these works, including the one entitled "Propaganda in the Next War," is a man whose name is recognized the world over as an authority in Great Britain. He is none other than Capt. Liddell Hart, associated with the London Times, a writer and a military authority in Europe. I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD at this point the account which I find in the British "Who's Who" concerning Capt. Liddell Hart.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Liddell Hart, Basil Henry: Military correspondent of the Times, and its adviser on defence in general; b. 31 Oct. 1895; m. 1918, Jessie, d. of J. J. Stone, Stratford Lodge, Stroud; one s. Mr. NYE. This work, Propaganda in the Next War, staggers the imagination. It amazes me that men could be so brazen in laying down the plans which are to entrap us, publish them, and give them, at least for a few days, to the world.

I understand that this particular volume, Propaganda in the Next War, published last fall and placed in circulation, instead of having its circulation enlarged, now is suffering at the hands of those who desire to retire it from circulation. A few days ago I came on the floor of the Senate with the volume itself. I am sorry I have not it with me today. I am told that it is the only copy of Propaganda in the Next War available in the United States. It can be had; I can borrow it again if there is occasion and need for it in the Senate; but it is no longer easy to obtain. I wish the entire work might be read by every Member of the Senate. One particular chapter, however, is one which every Member of the Senate ought to be required to read. It is the chapter entitled "Enemies, Neutrals, and Allies," a large portion of which is given over to a description of just how they are going to manage their propaganda upon the United States in the event of the next war; and in the light of what we are seeing happen day after day in this country, I am given to wonder, as others must be given to wonder, if perchance that propaganda is not already under way.

"Enemies, Neutrals, and Allies" is the title of chapter 4, which I have had typed from the book Propaganda in the Next War. I shall not read all of it to the Senate, but after I shall have concluded reading certain portions of it I shall ask unanimous consent that the whole chapter be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. President, the early pages of the chapter are given over to the manner in which England will handle propaganda in the countries of her enemies, how she will get her propaganda to the people in the lands which she is fighting in the next war. We find this writer and authority pointing out, too, how large a part in world consideration the word "democracy" is going to play in the next war, how readily it lends itself to a play which will invite the prejudices of a people who may not stop to analyze what is being done under the name and in the name of "democracy."

This British authority and writer is greatly concerned for fear they are not going to be able to make as large use another time as they did during the last war of so-called atrocity stories, remembering how easily they preyed upon our minds and worked upon our sympathies by the tales, since proven so thoroughly untrue, of the dismemberment of women and children, and the other terrible inflictions that were visited upon helpless people. Now they wonder if it is going to take at another time, in light of the fact, strange as it may seem, that there are so many atrocities being practiced all over the world today without any war being involved. The writer says:

Atrocity propaganda will be less effective with neutrals in the next war. They have been sated with it in peace.

* * * * * * *

Since on paper our case toward neutrals appears to lack a mainspring, it will behoove us to manufacture what we can and press it everywhere we can—a task of making bricks with little straw, at which we showed ourselves to excel in the last war.

I wish to stress particularly the plans of propagandists to take their straws, in the form of statements which lack truth, and manufacture them into the brick which are to be our undoing, destroy our neutrality, and embroil us in another foreign war. The writer continues:

In the realm of the moving-picture industry we may be able to depend on the natural bias of the United States film manufacturers in favor of Great Britain as opposed to Germany, Japan, or Italy, and on their command of the machinery of international film distribution. This will be an asset both with the stock entertainment picture and the news reels.

Again we find the author of this work on British propaganda in the next war demonstrating how they will resort to the use of foreign languages in portraying their cause. But part 4 of this particular chapter is the one directly devoted to us here in the United States, and I shall insist on reading almost in its entirety that portion of the work. I read:

There remains the United States—the great neutral. In the next war, as in the last, the result will probably depend upon the way in which the United States acts, and her attitude will reflect the reaction of her public to propaganda properly applied. During the Great War the efforts of the rival propagandists in the United States almost stagger belief. The Germans were the more amazing and their activities amounted to a degree of interference in American domestic affairs which will surely never be tolerated again. They entered the field of United States labor politics, organizing their own union. They set up all sorts of propagandist bodies, whether supposedly pacifist organizations which adroitly blamed the Allies for keeping the war going or bureaus to work upon and inflame Negro opinion. They appealed to university-trained and professional men. They reached women by forming such bodies as the League of American Women for Strict Neutrality, and workingmen through Labor's National Peace Council. They even bought a New York daily paper. We were almost as thorough though less blatant in our methods. Among our multifarious activities was the supply of a regular British news sheet to no fewer than 360 smaller American papers.

For some time the issue as to which side the United States would take hung in the balance, and in the final result was a credit to our propaganda—

Meaning British propaganda—

We were helped by the carelessness of the Germans. They continually overreached themselves and, with all their native tendency to overorganization, forgot to cover up their tracks. Their propaganda was as obvious as it was energetic. I repeat, it is unthinkable that such a dog fight between non-Americans will again be permitted in the United States.

That is a happy conclusion to draw. I wish we might draw the same conclusion, that we could hope to escape that dog fight in propaganda. But I wonder how well prepared we are to avoid repetition of the same degree of propagandist dog fight as that which occurred at that time.

This British writer says, in another portion of his work:

Secondly, the American peoples are still under the influence of much of the Great War propaganda. They are more susceptible than most peoples to mass suggestion—they have been brought up on it—and since 1918 they have shut themselves off from reality. Thirdly, they are at this moment the battleground of an active propaganda of labels.

There is no sense in refusing to recognize that there has always been a substratum of suspicion of Great Britain in the United States.

Then the author proceeds to show how in the years that followed the last war much of that which was basic to the building of our prejudices in the United States against Great Britain has been eliminated. Correctives have been accomplished. The issues are no longer what they then were; but this writer admits there are still some prejudices. He says in this regard:

There remain the Jews. It has been estimated that of the world Jew population of approximately 15,000,000, no fewer than 5,000,000 are in the United States. Twenty-five percent of the inhabitants of New York are Jews. During the Great War—

I want the Senators to note this language of this British author—

During the Great War we bought off—

Do not misunderstand me—

we bought off this huge American Jewish public by the promise of the Jewish National Home in Palestine, held by Ludendorff to be the master stroke of allied propaganda, as it enabled us not only to appeal to Jews in America but to Jews in Germany as well. Since then our attempts to implement our undertaking have landed us in difficulties with the indigenous Arabs, agitated by Italian propaganda, without satisfying the Jews. We have not satisfied the educated British Jews. How much less have we satisfied the more remote Jew community on the other side of the Atlantic?

In addition, the recent realist policy of the British Government has been worked up into a propaganda of significant extent and intensity which represents Great Britain as being "half Fascist," excuse the label, all ready and prepared to "sell the democratic pass" and go "all Fascist" at the first convenient opportunity. This is being developed by the intense Jewish hatred of Germany and from her of all dictator countries, and backed by the influence of the Catholic Church and undenominational liberals. At the moment, we have a strong section of American opinion against us, but if war were to break out tomorrow between England and Germany this mass of opinion would have to come down on one side or the other, and it will be marvelous indeed if German propaganda could succeed in bringing it down on theirs.

In general, the situation in the United States is more favorable to Great Britain than in 1914, in that the obvious centers of infection have been removed, but less favorable in that we have temporarily at any rate lost caste as a "democratic" state because of the propaganda which represents us as truckling to, or at least having truck with "dictators." Though we are not unfavorably placed, we shall require to do much propaganda to keep the United States benevolently neutral. To persuade her to take our part will be much more difficult, so difficult as to be unlikely to succeed. It will need a definite threat to America, a threat, moreover, which will have to be brought home by propaganda to every citizen, before the Republic will again take arms in an external quarrel.

But this author is certain that there is one challenge which will surely bring the United States into Britain's next war. Listen to the author:

The position will naturally be considerably eased if Japan were involved, and this might and probably would bring America in without further ado. At any rate, it would be a natural and obvious object of our propagandists to achieve this, just as during the Great War they succeeded in embroiling the United States with Germany.

Fortunately with America, our propaganda is on firm ground. We can be entirely sincere, as our main plank will be the old democratic one. We must clearly enunciate our belief in the democratic form of government and our firm resolve to adhere to it.

Our minor propaganda will aim at attaching the support of important sections, such as the Jews, probably by the declaration of a clear-cut policy in Palestine, and of our intention, if victorious, to put an end to anti-Semitic persecutions; and of the Roman Catholic community in similar terms. These should not be difficult to pursue nor to put over to the American public. We shall, as before, send over our leading literary lights and other men with names well known in the United States to put our point of view over the dinner table. Our trouble here will be to find men with equally commanding reputations to step into the shoes of such as Kipling, Barrie, Shaw, Galsworthy, and Wells. Conversely, we should exploit to the full the views and experiences of American nations who might be serving in our forces or those of our allies.

And so on, and on, and on, Mr. President, goes this author, picturing the plans, the means that will be resorted to to invite active American interest in the British cause, whatever that cause may be. So go their plans to make sure that America will repeat her serious mistake of 1917, and enter a foreign war, pouring out her resources of life and wealth for the winning of what we thought to be the finest causes upon this earth, only to discover after the war was all over that we did not have a chance to win one of those causes when we went into that war. There is no assurance that we would be able to win anything more than the war. And I hope with all my heart, Mr. President, that we in the United States will take that last experience and lay it alongside of the promise that is made by these British authorities to bring into play their propaganda upon us, and that thereby we may be led to a conviction that before ever we move in that direction again we must have more assurance by far than we had the last time that we may be able to win the things we say we are fighting for, as well as win the war.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. I apologize to the Senator for interrupting him, but I did not hear his opening remarks, so I have been unable to learn who is going to get us into war. Who is it that wants to drag us in? And from what is the Senator reading?

Mr. NYE. I take it the Senator from Indiana was not here when I began my argument.

Mr. MINTON. No; I was not in the Senate Chamber when the Senator from North Dakota began. I am sorry.

Mr. NYE. I have been reading from a chapter appearing in a book published in Great Britain last fall entitled "Propaganda in the Next War." The author is Sidney Rogerson. The editor in chief of this book, and the series of books running along with it under the heading The Next War, is Capt. Liddell Hart, an eminent British authority on the staff of the New York Times, who gives his assistance to this work, and gives it a credit which cannot be denied.

Mr. MINTON. What contacts have these men in the United States which lead the Senator to believe that such dire things are going to happen?

Mr. NYE. I am sorry the Senator did not hear me read precisely the people in this country to whom the British propagandists will be looking to help them pull their chestnuts out of the fire in the next emergency.

Mr. MINTON. The information is in the RECORD, then?

Mr. NYE. Yes. I know the Senator will, with much interest, read it in the RECORD.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. I listened with a great deal of interest to his remarks on the same subject, upon which I spoke yesterday in the Senate. I am interested in obtaining a little information. As I understand, this distinguished author says that if and when Europe gets into war America will be the target again for propaganda from both sides. Is that correct?

Mr. NYE. Well, he is a little more direct than that. He suggests how they will manage the next time to get us into their war.

Mr. WILEY. In the statement the Senator has presented it was set forth how the Allies and also the Central Powers during the last war did everything to bring us into the conflict on one side or the other. It was further suggested in the statement that perhaps in the next war America will not permit this land to be such a fertile ground for propaganda, and that brings me to this thought: Have aliens in the United States any right to freedom of speech or freedom of the press when it involves a matter of propaganda or involves the question of getting us into war?

Mr. NYE. If they do have such right, and there be their kind who want to involve us in war, we certainly ought to see to it that any right of that kind is taken away from them, and I wish the way might be found to do it.

Mr. WILEY. That is what I was going to suggest. Has the Senator any concrete suggestion now, anticipating that Europe may get into war, as to what we should do to stop the alleged propagandists in the future?

Mr. NYE. Under the Constitution, there is a large question in my mind how far we can go in legislating in that field. I do not think it ought to be difficult at all to legislate the alien out of an influential position.

Mr. WILEY. That is my theory.

Mr. NYE. But I am sure that the minute we did that the alien would invite the cooperation and make available to himself the interests and the activities of those who have American citizenship. Those things can be bought for a price from people who do not look very far ahead to what the consequences might be.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. We will not have to worry much about the propaganda contained in the book to which the Senator referred, as I understand there is only one copy of it in the United States. Is that correct?

Mr. NYE. The Senator has not yet understood just what this book is.

Mr. MINTON. Is there more than one copy in the United States?

Mr. NYE. I am told that it is probably the only copy in the United States.

Mr. MINTON. Who owns the copy, if that is not asking the Senator an unfair question?

Mr. NYE. Will the Senator be satisfied if I tell him that a dean in a very prominent American university is in possession of the book? I have seen it.

Mr. MINTON. If it is so closely guarded and so little circulated, we do not have to worry much about the propaganda it contains, do we?

Mr. NYE. From the standpoint of the British propagandists, I think what they would least desire is the circulation of this particular book among us. The book is plainly a handbook for British propagandists. I am told that this work and other works are accepted as handbooks in British military circles. Liddell Hart is quite an authority on this and other subjects, and is looked upon as such.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I happen to have seen that volume, and I think it was not intended for circulation in this country, but rather to be a handbook for British propaganda.

Mr. NYE. That is quite correct.

Mr. BONE. It was not intended to be propaganda in this country, but merely to explain the technique and the method of approach that would be employed by British propagandists in the event of war.

Mr. NYE. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. It was not intended to reach the American public, but to provide for the British propagandists some sort of mechanism of approach in spreading propaganda. Am I correct?

Mr. NYE. The Senator is entirely correct. I may say that my whole purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate, and, if it reaches that far, to the attention of the country, is to show the existence of a basic plan of propaganda to involve us in the next war, to the end that in the future we may be far better prepared than we have been in the past to know it when we see it, when we encounter it, and be better prepared to resist it.

Mr. MINTON. Has the Senator any information about anyone who is trying to carry out the plan outlined in the handbook to which he has referred? I think it would be very interesting to know who it is that is trying to carry it out.

Mr. NYE. I think we would probably find something very interesting if we could have access to the lists of foreign educators and lecturers who have been spreading themselves out over America during the last couple of months. I hope to be prepared with such a list at an early date.

Mr. MINTON. Has the Senator observed any foreign lecturers anywhere in our country using the technique outlined in the handbook to which he has referred?

Mr. NYE. No; I have not. I ask that the entire chapter from which I have been reading be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The Next War, a series edited by Capt. Liddell Hart]

PROPAGANDA IN THE NEXT WAR

(By Sidney Rogerson)

CHAPTER IV. ENEMIES, NEUTRALS, AND ALLIES

It should now be possible, it is hoped, to see fairly clearly what amount of offensive propaganda will be practicable in the next war and the methods by which it is to be pressed. At the same time it will, for obvious reasons, not be desirable to inquire too closely into the subject, especially so far as it concerns action toward the enemy.

It has been seen that Germany, to a lesser degree Italy, and in a different manner Japan, will constitute difficult problems for the offensively minded propagandist. Directing our thoughts on Germany, we should remark that whereas in 1914 the "all-highest" was enthusiastically supported by the majority of Germans, the regime rested on the basis of a governing caste. On a conservative estimate there must have been from 30 to 45 percent of German opinion opposed politically to the imperial system and lukewarm or antipathetic to its interests. These radical and socialist elements were powerful, well organized, and owned their own press. After the first flush of racial patriotism cooled, but before war weariness had set in, they represented a potentially receptive atmosphere for liberal propaganda. When the blockade and military pressure became acute, they were readily influenced by our propaganda to become agents of disaffection or peace. We had, therefore, an audience to appeal to in the enemy's country. We had also the message to which this audience were by nature or conviction sympathetic—the message of liberty, freedom, and equality. There were still parliamentary forms of government in Germany and Austria, based vaguely on our own Westminster model. The radical elements in the two countries had faith in these and believed that the machine could be captured by electoral methods and used to carry out the reforms in which they were interested. The gospel of our propagandists was their gospel. Thirdly, we had the means to reach them through their papers and our pamphlets. The former were naturally subject to wartime censorship, but they were not then bolted and barred against every item of copy that had not been scrutinized and approved by Government propaganda experts trained to detect the faintest suspicion of antinational propaganda. Substantial was the volume of such propaganda which these papers reproduced, lifted largely from their contemporaries in Switzerland, Holland, Denmark, and Scandinavia. Regular news services were supplied by our propagandists to these countries in the certainty that much of them would be copied into the German press. Then the trench lines ran close together from the sand dunes of Dunkerque to the Alps. Pamphlets were shot over by mortars and grenades to the fighting troops and dropped in millions over the back areas and in Germany. In all this propaganda we had, moreover, very much our own way. We could concentrate on the work in hand in the absence of any concerted German counter propaganda.

Next time the conditions will be very different. The basis on which the German regime rests has been made much broader. It is now a popular, as opposed to a caste regime, and it will have, in the early days at any rate, the support of the bulk of the German masses, as well as a large percentage of the classes. There will be the antipathetic minority, but this will be much more closely watched and controlled, and moreover will not be inherently susceptible to the old democratic slogans. It will tend naturally to connect these with the dark days of inflation, Spartacist and Communist risings, the occupations by French and African troops, the days of hatreds, humiliations, and starvation, and the connection of ideas will have been cleverly fostered by energetic and all-pervading propaganda. Not only will the old slogans be unacceptable, but it will be much more difficult to present them. There will be no papers to rely upon other than those pursuing an effective anti-democratic policy by advancing the concrete gospel of national socialism. There will, in addition, be less opportunity for the organization of pamphlet campaigns—that is, unless a German-French fighting front is again stabilized along the Maginot line, for example. Finally, the enemy will not be supine as in the Great War, but engaged actively and efficiently in developing a propaganda offensive against us.

Where, then, are we to look for the weak chinks in his totalitarian armor? Where, for the matter of that, are we to find a propaganda blade "fit for the deed we have to do"? The problem, as I see it, lies not so much in the strength of the enemy's position as in our difficulty of selecting a constructive line of policy which we can adhere to and which will make any effective appeal to people brought up on totalitarian propaganda. There are some lines which we can rule out from the beginning. We cannot propose a vote of no confidence in the regime nor hope to benefit from abuse of Hitler. We cannot advance a propaganda of material well-being. The Germans have been taught that we live in luxury and slothfulness, but that we are soullessly selfish, and that we will see to it that no one else gets a share of our comforts if we can prevent it. We cannot promise the benefits of democratic freedom. The German has too much experience of this or what he thinks it implies, and has risen to that fly once already. We cannot promise territorial rewards. After all, it will be argued, England has had chances innumerable of making some arrangement about colonies, which she would not take. "Now," the enemy propagandist may declare, "Germany is going to force her to disgorge or perish in the attempt."

As with Germany so with Italy and Japan. None of the old-time rallying cries of "liberty" or "democracy" or some association of free peoples are calculated to have any influence. While the totalitarian states are fresh and confident I cannot see any constructive line of propaganda policy that is open to us to pursue against them, and there is no justification for the assumption that they will tire any more quickly than states less organized for war. This need not dismay us, however. Offensive propaganda does not begin to be effective until the atmosphere is receptive; in the Great War nearly 4 years had passed before this condition was reached. It is on this account that I began by saying that it is reasonable to argue that the next war will not favor the development of propaganda directly against the enemy; but, as I have stressed throughout, if it should develop into a war of attrition, propaganda will come into its own again. Some constructive idea would then almost certainly be thrown up; and we shall have men clever enough, I hope, to seize on this and exploit it. Unless war spreads and involves all Europe, and we again attempt to engage in it on the Continent, there will be no points at which Great Britain and Germany will touch. Our frontiers may be the Rhine and theirs the Thames Estuary, but these will only be maintained in the air, if at all. Therefore air-borne propaganda, whether by airplane or radio, looks to be the only obvious means of approaching each other at first.

If there is one direction in which we may look with a reasonable hope of results for the creation of a favorable atmosphere, it is to the rigidity of the German propaganda control. We may well take a hint from jiujitsu, and see how far we may use the enemy's strength against him. I cannot believe that a healthy and virile people, however conscientious they are in acquiescing in control in the national interest, can feel happy when this control is arbitrarily extended to cover the most trivial items of general interest. There is evidence that good Germans, educated men and many of them loyal members of "the party," already rely upon English and foreign newspapers to keep abreast of general nonpolitical developments. The German has a veneration for knowledge. He elevates erudition on a high altar, and is concerned at all times to appear well informed. It is not merely that he is genuinely fond of learning; he senses also that he is the parvenu in European civilization. How often have I not had Germans apologize to me that in political development their country was 200 years behind our own, arguing that this was why we found it so difficult to understand their methods. It is a manifestation of an inferiority complex that impels the barbarian, conscious of his skins and his cave drawings, to cry down the silks and oil paintings of civilization as evidence of decadence, the while he furtively but energetically sets about copying them to the best of his ability. This is no very inaccurate description of the German attitude, with the addition that the German leaders from Nietzsche to Ludendorff and Stuermer have tried to make a virtue out of this barbarian inferiority and to raise the idol of the "blond beast" and of "blood and iron." I suggest, therefore, that this sense of inferiority may be played upon and that our propaganda should stress to the Germans their ignorance. There must be no blame laid on their leaders. On the contrary, these must be extolled for their ability in difficult circumstances, the implication being that they, too, are ignorant of what the world is thinking. Excellent fellows, no doubt, but blind leaders of the blind. Once an uneasiness about comparatively small facts that have been kept from them is planted in the minds of thinking Germans, something important will have been accomplished. In the circumstances, even this much will be difficult, but not impossible. Although German preparedness is avowedly based on the need to defend the Fatherland, the theory that is implied in all the rearming and mass mobilization is surely one of attack. Germany is taking over the French doctrine of elan, "l'audace, toujours l'audace," and basing her hopes and her organization on a swift overwhelming onrush. She has, I think, in her home propaganda, not directly but by implication, lifted the eyes of her people away from the old, humiliating pictures of defense against encircling enemies to the newer visions of all Germans united to assert themselves against those who deny them their rights. It should therefore be psychologically correct to see how this new-found, though as yet untried, confidence can be struck the most telling blow. This seems to me to lie in the organization, immediately on the outbreak of war, of large-scale air attacks on the German industrial centers in which not only bombs but pamphlets would be dropped pointing out that poor Fritz was probably so ill informed that he did not know that British planes could reach German cities as easily as the converse—and that they would do so. The keynote all through would be obliquely the suppression of information in Germany, coupled with direct revelations, which the propagandee might verify, based on the course of operations. By this method propaganda would be combined with offensive military action, which I believe would be psychologically right.

The same text would be discoursed upon in all our radio broadcasts directed to neutral countries in the hope that they would be picked up in Germany. We should inform the Dutch, the Swiss, and others how amazing it was that even the more ordinary occurrences were withheld from the Germans. From time to time there would be opportunist sniping of detailed news, such as casualties, over German wave lengths and disguised interpolations when a German station was silent during an interval. The latter might be made very effective on the same theme. An even more directly hopeful field to exploit would be the enemy nationals domiciled in foreign countries. There are large concentrations of Germans, Italians, and Japanese in South America, notably in Brazil, in the United States of America, and elsewhere, and it will be the duty of our propagandists to see that a steady stream of information is directed at these and that facilities are tacitly accorded to them to relay the gist of this in their letters home to their countryfolk behind the bars of totalitarian suppression. Sympathetically worked upon, these extramural enemy nationals will be the most convincing witnesses to the truth, so many stones dropped into the propaganda pond whose ripples may be readily enlarged upon. Simultaneously every effort would be made to reach disaffected intellectuals and others by having news or pamphlets posted to them inside Germany, though this would be much more difficult than previously, especially in the early stages of a war.

Japan seems to be quite as difficult to attack directly by propaganda, but her Achilles' heel, as I have suggested, may well be found in the countries she has annexed. It should be a first duty to attempt by propaganda to foment sedition in Formosa, Korea, Manchuria, and such parts of China proper as she may by then have taken under her control, so that as large a part of her energies as possible are dissipated in dealing with insurrection and revolt. While it seems tolerably certain that there will be plenty of lines of appeal, including some concrete idea of delivery from oppression, calculated to appeal to people subjected to a tyranny as harsh as the Japanese, the problem will be how to reach them. Newspapers will be a slender hope; they will only circulate among the educated handful, and their activities and contents will be subject to the most rigorous censorship. The wireless will be relatively useless in regions too far distant from potential transmitting stations and where a receiving set is a conspicuous rarity. The same applies to the cinema. There will be picture theaters in the great cities, but these will be under strict military control. There remain the airplane-and-pamphlet and the word-of-mouth methods of propaganda, and both these will be used to the limit. It is difficult to imagine Japan being engaged in a major war which did not also involve Russia, a fact which would immensely facilitate the development of anti-Japanese propaganda throughout the countries of the Far Eastern mainland, though there would be ractions against Russian-made propaganda among sections where anti-Communist views were in the ascendant.

Italy, as I have said, is a more hopeful problem. Both owing to the liberal leaven and to the existence of a traditional feeling of friendship for Great Britain, there is a chance of making propaganda directly at the Italian peoples. The former will, unless the existing restrictions are greatly tightened up on the advent of war, afford ways and means for the entry of propaganda into Italy; the latter might constitute a valuable basis for our propaganda, especially, if and when the time should come, against the Duce. It should only be necessary for his speeded-up timetable of war plans to miscarry, for the Italians to learn of reverses as aerial and naval war was carried to their coasts; for us to point out that in the good old days, before they were led into the paths of oppression and conquest by their brilliant leader, such bloodshed of Italians by British airmen or sailors would have been unthinkable. Think of all the thousands of Italians interned in England. But how happy they are! How well fed and cared for! Here are some photos of men from Naples, imprisoned in the Alexandra Palace. They send their salutations to their brothers, undernourished and anxious. This line of propaganda attack will, I fancy, be likely to be possible earlier and to work more quickly against Italy than either Germany or Japan. The Germans have always vaguely felt that they had a divine mission; they have a great faith in their race and in themselves. The Japanese are confident to the pitch of bigotry. The Italians are less sure of themselves. I repeat, it is only possible to do so much by precept and teaching, and all this Mussolini has done. He cannot change his raw material, only improve it; nor make a colonial administration out of men who are more content to be led. Thus, the morale of the Italian will not be entirely above suspicion and, moreover, his newly acquired colonial Empire will be a positive source of danger. The Italian Peninsula may poke a dangerous finger into our imperial communications, and Italian propaganda and intrigue stir up hornets' nests about our ears in the Near East and Egypt, but Italy is very vulnerable herself. The Germans of the Trentino must dislike their Italian masters as much as they must be casting longing eyes across the Brenner. Then there are the Arabs of Libya, over whom the Italian lords it repressively but uneasily, and the freshly won Empire of Abyssinia. Here are surely foci for propaganda so long as we can select a line of policy which we can advance toward Arabs or Abyssinians without reacting on African peoples under our own flag.

There are, then, two indicated lines of propaganda action—one designed to shake the Italian's confidence in himself and his leaders; the other to stir up trouble in the lands where Italians rule over other peoples. The Italians are held in low regard not only by the white but by some of the colored races. This should simplify the direction of propaganda toward their African colonies, and the fact that these march with British possessions or spheres of influence should enable comparisons between the African's lot in Abyssinia under Italian rule to be contrasted with that in Kenya or Tanganyika under the British flag.

There will also be immediately available a wider variety of means for disseminating propaganda against Italy than against Germany or Japan. Italian newspapers might even in certain circumstances be capable of exploitation fairly soon. Extensive use would undoubtedly be made of the pamphlet-carrying airplane both in Italy and her colonies and the radio would help with the Italians as well as in certain of her possessions where there are receiving sets.

II

Taking it all in all, however, there does not seem to be a great future for the direct propaganda offensive in the next war, unless this should turn out to be a protracted and wearying affair. For offensive propaganda we shall look rather to the indirect variety, directed toward neutrals and allies—to engage the former on our side if possible, but at all costs to prevent their going over to the enemy, and to keep the latter at concert pitch against the enemy. This neutral zone will be the great battleground of propaganda, where both sets of combatants will fight each other with all their energies and every known method. Here again, unless I am mistaken, we may find ourselves up against a tough problem at first. Here it is:

During the Great War the world lay under the spell of democracy. It was still a word to conjure with; no one had dared to challenge its meaning. Despite the presence of Japan and Russia in the ranks of the Allies, and of the near republic of the young Turks among the central empires, the war was fairly accurately represented by allied propagandists as a struggle between "democracy" and the "forces of reaction," the implication being that "democracy" was to stop the world from plunging into "chaos and night." Since 1918 democracy has been challenged. It is now on the defensive. Germany and Italy are constructive as well as repressive. They have an idea to put forward—not, many people may say, a first-class idea, but a concrete one all the same. Their battalions of trained propagandists make the very best out of it, representing their countries as the forces of the new progress. Democracy, they assert, led to all sorts of humiliation and trouble—some countries into an uneasy twilight and others into definite "chaos and night." From this sorry state the "forces of progress" have rescued or are rescuing them. Whereas in 1914–18 democracy could be represented as the new force which held out a hope to a hopeless world, now it is being represented as the force which has been used by unscrupulous countries to cover their seizure of all that is worth having and, having taken this, to preserve the status quo in a world of inequalities of work and wealth. The result of this propaganda is that while the democratic states—whether under a crowned sovereign or top-hatted president—have dwindled, the authoritarian model is very popular. Roughly speaking, the democracies are Great Britain, Belgium, France, the United States of America, Switzerland, Holland, and the Scandinavian countries. The dictatorships are Germany, Italy, Russia, Turkey, Portugal, Japan, Greece, Poland, Hungary, Bulgaria, and practically all the South American Republics, led by Brazil. Spain will shortly join their ranks, and possibly China, if she can hold out long enough against the Japanese. Not all of these are totalitarian in the strict sense of the word, nor necessarily of a National Socialist character, but all are undemocratic in fact, and many of them therefore antidemocratic in spirit.

Some of them were once seats of British influence, notably South America, but are now under a constant spray of German and Italian propaganda by wirelessed news, short-wave radio talks, and personal effort which has begun to percolate. Some of them, like Portugal, are traditional friends and will probably be on our side in sentiment if not in fact in the next war, but what propaganda line, unless the enemy presents us with a special opportunity, can we take with Portugal except our centuries-old friendship? Turkey is a vigorous state which will be most important to us, and which we are assiduously wooing with apparent success, but in the actual field of propaganda what can be put forward against Germany that is constructive? There can be no doubt that the next war will be billed as a fight between democracy and dictatorship. It may in fact be nothing of the sort. We might get Italy as a partner and Germany Belgium; authoritarian Portugal is likely to come in with us and the democratic Scandinavian countries may well remain strictly neutral. In the ultimate resort, alliances spring from the hope of material advantage, not the possession of a common ideological belief, but in our propaganda we must make the facts fit our case as far as possible. We shall almost certainly represent the struggle in the propaganda we shall be compelled to do toward France, the United States of America, and our own Empire as democracy and freedom versus dictatorship and persecution. As propaganda must be unified, how are we to pursue the energetic policy we should to the neutrals, many of whom, like Spain, Portugal, Greece, and Turkey are so vital to us? We cannot speak with two voices in our propaganda. This, of course, applies to what, borrowing a military adjective, I may call the grand propaganda. Without this backbone minor propaganda can only achieve little with much effort, though we shall obviously set out to do as much of this as we can. It will enable us to burke the main issue, and it can, of course, be very embarrassing to the enemy. A storm of quite respectable dimensions was, for example, in 1916 worked up in neutral countries with a snapshot of Bernstorff, the then German Ambassador to America. The photo which was picked up from Bernstorff's desk by an alert British agent showed the ambassador in a "swimsuit" with his arm around two "bathing belles" similarly clad. It was entirely innocent, but it was published almost all over the world in such a fashion as to suggest the worst sort of ambassadorial gallantry, conduct unbecoming even a Prussian officer and a gentleman! Again my feeling is that it will be more difficult to prejudice neutral feeling against Germany or Italy than against Japan. How, for example, can we hope to rouse passions against the German dictatorship by reciting the persecutions of Jews who are thrust into concentration camps, thrashed, and spit upon, or against the Italian by broadcasting the number of Arabs who have been dropped from Graziani's airplanes and intellectuals forcibly dosed with castor oil; how can we hope by such propaganda to rouse the passions of dictator countries like Spain, Turkey, the Latin-American, or the Balkan States, where torture, mutilation, and butchery are understandable methods in an emergency? Where is the point of preaching democratic tolerance to a Turkish leader who solved his parliamentary problem by hanging his whole opposition party? We may also reflect on the deliberate slaughter by the Turks of the 100,000 Greeks at Smyrna in 1921, and the Japanese massacre of hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children in China. Atrocity propaganda will be less effective with neutrals in the next war. They have been sated with it in peace.

Japan's distinction is that she is unpopular. Her drastic underselling methods and her tactless dumping of shoddy articles at cheap prices have combined to create a widespread resentment against her. She is a commercial danger, and therefore the more easily, from the propaganda viewpoint, saddled with atrocities. That is a cynical observation, perhaps, but a truism nevertheless, for in war those nations with whom one is in sympathy can do no wrong: Those from whom one has something to fear never do right. In addition, Japan does challenge humanitarian opinion everywhere and it is interesting to study the way in which China, largely through the inspiration of Madam Chiang, it is believed, is slowly building up a propaganda case against her. A notable feature of this is the exposure of Japan's deliberate debauching of Chinese populations by encouraging the opium and cocaine habits. This is indeed a way of waging war which could only be conceived by an oriental.

Since on paper our case toward neutrals appears to lack a mainspring, it will behoove us to manufacture what we can and press it everywhere we can—a task of making bricks with little straw at which we showed ourselves to excel in the last war. We may, of course, find the enemy unconsciously presenting us, as he did last time, with many opportunities to develop propaganda against him, but, however useful opportunistic propaganda may be, we cannot rely on it, nor can it take the place of constructive propaganda. As to methods, there will naturally be a stampede for space in the neutral papers, and we may get an extra share on account of old good will or friendship as well as on the merits of our propaganda. It is fortunate that the neutral states lying nearest Germany are those—Switzerland, Holland, and Scandinavia—which all merit the adjective "democratic." They will accordingly be likely to reproduce much of our propaganda—though they will have to be more discreet than last time—and some of it may leak into Germany. In the realm of the cinema we may be able to depend on the natural bias of the United States film manufacturers in favor of Great Britain as opposed to Germany, Japan, or Italy, and on their command of the machinery of international film distribution. This will be an asset both with the stock entertainment picture and the news reels. Our own pictures will not count any more in continental countries than they do now. Germany has a better hold on the European market than we have, though neither of us can seriously challenge the Americans. We shall overhaul and intensify our radio broadcasts to neutrals, especially those who still have democratic sympathies, but we shall have a hard task getting in against the enemy propaganda which through constant effort in time of peace has already won an established position. Germany and Italy have both been broadcasting on the short wave for some years in English as well as other languages. We shall stand a better chance of success in our propaganda to neutral countries if we face the position that many of them, though not necessarily ill-disposed toward us, will not, from the nature of their politics, be receptive to our democratic propaganda. Those that will be likely to be sympathetic will have to walk delicately in the matter of propaganda owing to the sensitiveness of Germany and Italy on the matter.

III

There remains the United States—the great neutral. In the next war, as in the last, the result will probably depend upon the way in which the United States acts, and her attitude will reflect the reaction of her public to propaganda properly applied. During the Great War the efforts of the rival propagandists in the United States almost stagger belief. The Germans were the more amazing and their activities amounted to a degree of interference in American domestic affairs which will surely never be tolerated again. They entered the field of United States labor politics, organizing their own union. They set up all sorts of propagandist bodies, whether supposedly pacifist organizations which adroitly blamed the Allies for keeping the war going or bureaus to work upon and inflame Negro opinion. They appealed to university-trained and professional men. They reached women by forming such bodies as the League of American Women for Strict Neutrality, and working men through Labor's National Peace Council. They even bought a New York daily paper. We were almost as thorough though less blatant in our methods. Among our multifarious activities was the supply of a regular British news sheet to no fewer than 360 smaller American papers.

For sometime the issue as to which side the United States would take hung in the balance, and if the final result was a credit to our propaganda, we were helped by the carelessness of the Germans. They continually overreached themselves and, with all their native tendency to overorganization, forgot to cover up their tracks. Their propaganda was as obvious as it was energetic. I repeat, it is unthinkable that such a dog fight between non-Americans will again be permitted in the United States. The American peoples have progressed a long way since those days, when foreign politics were hardly touched upon in any but a few of the greater newspapers. Nowadays the American foreign correspondent is one of the most resourceful and best informed in the world. They have what amounts almost to a passion for "debunking" foreign aims and ideas, but while they have encouraged Americans to interest themselves in politics overseas, they have not yet succeeded in transferring their own objective outlook to their readers. Excellently served though the Americans are by their news gatherers and reporters abroad, they can perhaps hardly be expected, in the security of their own detached hemisphere, to see European affairs realistically. For one thing the American is the great champion of the oppressed—and frequently of the soi-disant oppressed—which may explain why he is so frequently taken in by the hard-luck story of London confidence tricksters. Secondly, the American peoples are still under the influence of much of the Great War propaganda. They are more susceptible than most peoples to mass suggestion—they have been brought up on it—and since 1918 they have shut themselves off from reality. Thirdly, they are at this moment the battleground of an active propaganda of labels.

There is no sense in refusing to recognize that there has always been a substratum of suspicion of Great Britain in the United States. The American people may admire some of our traits and hold others in contempt, but they periodically tend to suspect our motives. During the Great War we were particularly vulnerable to indirect propaganda in the United States, and the Germans were able to work up a fierce feeling for the miserable Irish, struggling to get home rule; for the oppressed Indians, writhing under a British military despotism; for the fleasome fellaheen in Egypt, kept on the bare subsistence line; and for the poor Jew whose brethren were periodically beaten up or burned by Britain's allies. It is good to feel that in the next war those horses will not run; certainly not in the same colors. The bestowal of more than dominion status on Ireland, the Indian constitution, and the recognition of the Kingdom of Egypt have removed these dangerous centers of propaganda infection. Whatever, if anything, we may have lost by these concessions, they have made us so much the less vulnerable to enemy propaganda attack in America. It will be difficult again to rally American feeling against us on these counts. There remain the Jews. It has been estimated that of the world Jew population of approximately 15,000,000, no fewer than 5,000,000 are in the United States. Twenty-five percent of the inhabitants of New York are Jews. During the Great War we bought off this huge American Jewish public by the promise of the Jewish national home in Palestine, held by Ludendorff to be the master stroke of Allied propaganda, as it enabled us not only to appeal to Jews in America but to Jews in Germany as well. Since then our attempts to implement our undertaking have landed us in difficulties with the indigenous Arabs, agitated by Italian propaganda, without satisfying the Jews. We have not satisfied the educated British Jews. How much less have we satisfied the more remote Jew community on the other side of the Atlantic? In addition, the recent realist policy of the British Government has been worked up into a propaganda of significant extent and intensity which represents Great Britain as being "half Fascist"—excuse the label—all ready and prepared to "sell the democratic pass" and go "all-Fascist" at the first convenient opportunity. This is being developed by the intense Jewish hatred of Germany and from her of all dictator countries, and backed by the influence of the Catholic Church and undenominational liberals.

At the moment we have a strong section of American opinion against us, but if war were to break out tomorrow between England and Germany this mass of opinion would have to come down on one side or the other and it will be marvelous indeed if German propaganda could succeed in bringing it down on theirs.

In general the situation in the United States is more favorable to Great Britain than in 1914, in that the obvious centers of infection have been removed; but less favorable in that we have temporarily at any rate lost caste as a "democratic" state because of the propaganda which represents us as truckling to, or at least having truck with "dictators." Though we are not unfavorably placed, we shall require to do much propaganda to keep the United States benevolently neutral. To persuade her to take our part will be much more difficult, so difficult as to be unlikely to succeed. It will need a definite threat to America, a threat, moreover, which will have to be brought home by propaganda to every citizen, before the Republic will again take arms in an external quarrel. The position will naturally be considerably eased if Japan were involved and this might and probably would bring America in without further ado. At any rate, it would be a natural and obvious object of our propagandists to achieve this, just as during the great war they succeeded in embroiling the United States with Germany.

Fortunately with America our propaganda is on firm ground. We can be entirely sincere as our main plank will be the old democratic one. We must clearly enunciate our belief in the democratic form of government, and our firm resolve to adhere to it. Our minor propaganda will aim at attaching the support of important sections, such as the Jews, probably by the declaration of a clear-cut policy on Palestine and of our intention if victorious to put an end to anti-Semitic persecution, and of the Roman Catholic community in similar terms. These should not be difficult to pursue, nor to put over to the American public. We shall as before send over our leading literary lights and other men with names well known in the United States to put our point of view over the dinner table. Our trouble here will be to find men with equally commanding reputations to step into the shoes of such as Kipling, Barrie, Shaw, Galsworthy, and Wells. Conversely, we should exploit to the full the views and experiences of American nationals who might be serving in our forces or those of our allies. We should make much of them, decorate them, signal them out for mention in dispatches and in the press and use their stories as propaganda material to their own people. This was a form of propaganda very ably developed by the French during the great war. American newspapermen in London are of approved mettle and, though impervious to any obvious propaganda, should nevertheless represent a valuable propaganda force on the strength of the day to day news they send over, quite apart from the fact that many of them like this country. In an experience of knowing many of them over a period of 18 years I can echo Admiral Brownrigg's words praising "their absolute reliability, their honesty in preserving secret information which I had been compelled or perhaps had thought wise to impart to them, and their loyalty in never making use of it until I gave them the word 'go.'" We shall see that they are given every facility for observing and reporting and that their messages are censored sympathetically. Similarly with their news-reel men. They should be the first to be allowed to "shoot" pictures of air raids, in order that a proper volume of pictorial "horror" will be available in one of the few great countries where "atrocity propaganda" will still be operative. Our cables and wireless telegraph services will be available for less urgent or secret messages. Our radio propaganda should also be working at full pressure, but there must be a great improvement upon the present lackadaisical outlook. I can best illustrate this by the following personal experience. On the evening that the world was standing expectantly to hear the Prime Minister's pronouncement on Great Britain's attitude if the Germans followed their coup against Austria by one against Czechoslovakia, I ran into a friend who is possibly our best-known radio commentator. "Tell me what I'm going to tell America," he asked me. "I've got to do my weekly talk on British affairs over the American 'network' in half an hour and I haven't made up my mind what I ought to say." "But surely you're in touch with the Government," I replied. "Haven't they given you a line, knowing that you regularly reach hundreds of thousands of American listeners?" "Not a word," was his surprising answer. "I'm not in touch with any governmental source of information. They have never tried to get in touch with me, though someone must know what I'm doing. Still I've tried to get in touch with them." And he explained how he had previously been down to a certain Government department where he was permitted to see a junior member of the press office who could not be of any real service to him. This is sober fact, and illustrates as well as may be how much our authorities are doing to counteract the anti-British radio propaganda which is growing in the United States.

I must not, however, give the impression that we are doing absolutely nothing at present to direct propaganda toward foreign countries. That would be unfair to that esoteric body, the British Council, which occupies itself in what it calls "cultural propaganda" or more succinctly in spreading a "knowledge and appreciation of our language, literature, art, science, and education." It has numerous committees composed of politicians, civil servants, manufacturers and merchants, and educationists, and sends out British lecturers and musicians, gramophone records, periodicals, and literature to various foreign countries, entertains editors and educationists visiting England, and generally encourages the young idea, whether in Latvia or Uruguay, to learn and appreciate the English language. Although it has practically no permanent staff, it claims to discharge the onerous duties of coordinating the propaganda activities of other bodies, excellent in their own spheres, like the Travel Association (the old "Come to Britain" organization) and the Film Institute (a body which exists primarily to foster the educational and documentary film), and of linking these up with the British Broadcasting Co.'s vague operations.

Much of the council's work is no doubt excellent in its way, but it is emphatically not propaganda. In the present situation it is rather like trying to interest a working-class mother in fancy needlework when other energetic people are instructing her how to make her family budget go further. Cultural propaganda is a dilettante vision. It advances nothing constructive and, despite its hosts of committees, it is not unified. Moreover, it is not controlled either by experts or a permanent staff, but by a collection of enthusiastically minded amateurs. The worst that can be said about it is that it spends thousands of pounds of public money which might be more profitably applied; the best is that it can do no harm and may even wring a tear out of some aged native of Bulgaria or Peru who can recall the days before Great Britain thought it necessary artificially to stimulate an interest in her national culture. Also it may provide a skeleton which strengthened in the caliber as well as the numbers of its personnel and animated by a propaganda spirit, might be padded out as part of the ministry of propaganda in a future war.

Lastly, if anything is certain about the next war it is that we shall have France as our ally in chief, if not as our only certain ally outside the British Empire. Geographically, we are bound to France as inexorably as one member of a chain gang to the next; also the only things we have in common with her are this geographical contiguity and the desire to protect ourselves from any aggression on the part of Germany. Other than these, we have no real community of interests, methods, or outlook. This is not to say that sections, important and very vocal sections of British opinion, are not sincerely pro-French or to deny that France has probably the highest intellectual standards and the greatest measure of individual liberty of any country in the world, but propaganda unfortunately demands a unification of policy, and on this score our alliance with France is demonstrably weak. How to advance a concrete policy in line with France has been the difficulty ever since the armistice and will remain in a future war. Had we not been leg shackled to a logical France, determined as a continental nation to defend her own interests as appeared reasonable to her, the course of European propaganda and, therefore, history would have been different in the past 20 years. These fetters will hamper our propaganda to neutrals in the next war and not improbably to the main enemy also. Should we, by any fortunate chance, evolve a constructive idea for propaganda policy, we shall not be able to press it into use unless and until France agrees, and our outlook being so divergent, it may seldom be possible for her to agree. Equally, as our ally, we shall have to direct a continuous propaganda to her in the nature of a heart stimulant. Always suspicious, she will tend to question the seriousness of our war effort and the weight of our losses unless we give her constant proof. France is a very feminine partner, needing much patience and more attention, who will insist on approving anything we may wish to do and is capable of distracting us in any course on which we may both have agreed. This is the usual difficulty between allies, perhaps, but I feel that no charge of anti-French bias can be preferred against me for observing that she is not the easiest partner in a world situation like the present. Much propaganda effort will, therefore, have to be directed to keep her contented that we are also pulling our weight.

One of the most effective methods of convincing allies and neutrals is to provide their propagandists with facilities to inspect and write up our war effort for themselves. This was a sphere in which we excelled during the Great War, and it is one for which we have a special flair on account of our ability to steer a middle course between rigid secrecy and open publicity. But this sort of propaganda is a tricky business which demands imagination as well as patience and tact on the part of those charged with the propaganda duties, and which is seldom welcomed by the fighting forces, who are required constantly to divert responsible officers to "bear-lead" a stream of visiting foreign statesmen, pressmen, photographers, and cinematograph men. Moreover, it contains an element of danger. Still it is effective. Seeing is believing, and since the aim of the propagandist is to make news and see that it is reported, how better can he do this than by allowing it to be reported by those whom he wishes to influence? But those who have read Brownrigg's entertaining account of his experiences will have no doubts as to the snares and pitfalls which beset this particular propaganda path.

More attention will also require to be devoted to the countries of the Empire, which, owing to the changed status deriving from the Statute of Westminster, will properly claim to be regarded as allies, and there is no ally, not even a brother, who does not need special attention. While on general grounds the Empire can be expected to march in step with the mother country, there is no definite assurance that she will do so. We should take warning from the recent break-away of New Zealand on the League of Nations discussion on Abyssinia, and the possibility of racial or anti-imperial propaganda growing in strength in other dominions or India. The great relief in respect of propaganda toward allies is that there is no bother about how to reach them. All methods are available. The difficulty is to know just what to say and how much emphasis to lay on it. Indeed the utmost care is necessary for controlling propaganda toward allies. Most of the feeling of one ally for another is manufactured, and this is particularly true of the British, with whom, as I have indicated earlier, a potential enemy may change with the turn of the political weathercock into a trusted friend. For this reason this type of propaganda is really more important at home. If the French are our allies, it will be our concern to insure that our people think well of the French, and vice versa. Then the propagandist must be careful not to overstress the note of confidence. I have indicated the reaction of the Russians to confidence propaganda, and there is always the danger that, whereas in order to bring home the need for a united front, it is good to take the line that the allies are hand-in-glove and that therefore all is going well, some minor ally may argue "good, but if things are going well, there is no longer the same need for us to obey the more powerful allied powers. We'll act more on our own in future."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but for a few moments. If I understand the Senator, he is desirous that our country shall not be drawn into any international conflict, and that our policies shall be directed to that end. The American people desire peace. While our country has been a party to several conflicts I think it may be truthfully said that the traditions and teachings of the American people have been directed toward the promotion of peace, of fellowship at home, and international peace and good will. The founders of this Republic, and the American people generally, have been influenced by the teachings of the Christian religion; they have attempted to fashion their social and political life along religious, ethical, and spiritual lines; they have not been dogmatic, but, as I have indicated, they have sought to promote the most cordial and friendly relations among the people of all nations.

The American people look with grave concern upon the conflicts now raging in some parts of the world, and they are profoundly concerned in any movement that would result in the fires of international conflict being brought to our shores.

Democratic nations, though loving peace and abhoring war, cannot help but experience some concern when they see democratic peoples being attacked by dictators or by powerful and aggressive military forces. The records of the past are replete with the destruction of small and liberty-loving nations by greedy, powerful, and militaristic combinations. We cannot be oblivious to conditions in Europe and in Asia; to the wanton and unprovoked attacks by certain governments upon small and weaker nations and upon peace-loving and defenseless people, such as we find in China. Notwithstanding our sympathy for the oppressed and persecuted, the American people are sincere in their desire that no situation shall arise which will result in this nation's becoming a belligerent and taking part in world conflicts.

I desire, however, to comment very briefly upon an observation made by the distinguish Senator from North Dakota. If I correctly interpreted his remark it was tantamount to a condemnation of or a criticism of the United States for entering the World War. Mr. President, I know there are and will be differences of opinion as to the reasons or justification for our country's becoming a participant in that great conflict. However, in my opinion, history will justify the course pursued by our Government and acquit the American people of any improper or sinister purpose in joining the allied forces in that conflict.

Reference has been made by the Senator to what he denominates "propaganda" upon the part of Great Britain, if not other of the Allied Nations, and I gained the impression from his statement that our entrance into the World War was largely due to propaganda, particularly upon the part of Great Britain.

Mr. President, there was propaganda in the United States before we entered the World War, but in my opinion the most pervasive and sinister propaganda was carried on by representatives of the German Government. If there was propaganda in the United States disseminated by the Allied Nations, it was inconsequential measured by the activities of German agents and representatives, not only in the United States but in other countries. I recall Germany's diplomatic and consular representatives, actively, openly, and secretly, carried on the most vigorous propaganda in behalf of their Government. Attempts were made by representatives of Germany to draw Mexico into the contest upon the side of Germany and to induce the Mexican Government to assert authority over territory which constituted a part of the United States.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MALONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KING. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. NYE. I am sure the Senator has not read into anything I have said this afternoon language which would put me in the light of holding a brief for the propagandists of any country, at that time or now.

Mr. KING. No; and I acquit the Senator of any desire to aid any cause by propaganda, but when we speak of propaganda of the allied nations during the World War I am sure we would, if we desired to be entirely fair, refer to the propaganda of the Central Powers which was more extensive, if not sinister and malevolent.

Germany expended large sums in her propaganda movements and in endeavoring to secure moral, if not material, support from the United States as well as from other countries.

There was an organization in the United States known as the German-American Alliance which had been formed for entirely proper purposes. There were evidences that it was being utilized in behalf of Germany and her associates in the war.

I had occasion to make some investigation as to its activities and the investigation resulted in the surrender of the charter under which it was organized.

That there were rather powerful forces at work among the American people in behalf of Germany and the Central Powers, I think will be conceded by those who were familiar with conditions in the United States immediately before and after our Government entered that conflict.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Does not the Senator remember that prior to our entry into the World War the German Government secretly purchased the New York Mail and financed it to carry on its propaganda in this country?

Mr. KING. I recall that fact.

Mr. MINTON. And that a man by the name of Dr. Rumley ran the newspaper for them and was afterward convicted in the Federal courts of the offense of concealing the ownership of that newspaper?

Mr. KING. I thank the Senator for reminding me of the matters referred to.

Mr. President, may I say that I had no objection to the Central Powers or the Allied Governments' adopting honest and fair methods for the presentation of their respective causes to the world. It was quite natural, and was to be expected, that the Central Powers would covet the goodwill of the nations who were not parties to the conflict; nor did I object to the Allied Nations employing legitimate and proper methods to secure the goodwill and, for that matter, the support of other nations.

It is quite natural for belligerents to justify their course and to present to the world reasons which they claim warrant their engaging in military conflicts. It is obvious when nations are at war—whether they are Fascist, communistic, or democratic—they will be interested in securing the goodwill of nonbelligerent nations. In seeking this end undoubtedly they will not always pursue fair and honorable means. Too often they will resort to improper methods of intrigue and secret and malevolent activities. As I have indicated, some of the methods adopted by Germany may not be defended; indeed, they call for condemnation.

Mr. President, with reference to the Senator's statement criticizing our Government for entering the World War, permit me to say that, in my opinion, the United States was justified in associating itself with the Allied cause. I voted in favor of the declaration of war following the great message of the great President, Woodrow Wilson, and if the same conditions which then existed should again be presented, notwithstanding my abhorence of war, I should vote for my country to enter the war.

We all know that Mr. Wilson was a man of peace. There was no stronger character in our country at that time, than our President, and there was no person who was more devoted to peace than he. I might add for the benefit of my Republican friends that a great Republican leader—Theodore Roosevelt—was perhaps as resentful of Germany's conduct as any other person in our country. My recollection is that he favored the United States entering the war against Germany, when the latter sent her legions into Belgium and carried on a ruthless and destructive campaign against peaceable and unoffending people. Following this, cities and towns were destroyed and great cathedrals were bombed and the German legions then marched into France and carried woe and desolation into an important part of French territory. My recollection is that ex-President Roosevelt, before we entered the war, stated that the United States should have become a belligerent soon after Germany violated Belgian territory. His view was that an international wrong had been committed against peaceable and unoffending people.

However, the American people are averse to war. While the sympathies of most Americans were with the Allies and associated powers, nevertheless they restrained their feelings and pursued a neutral attitude. President Wilson urged that Americans be neutral in thought as well as in deed, and he exercised his great influence in the restraint of manifestations in favor of the Allied Powers as against the Central Powers. But finally Germany's policies became so cruel and ruthless that civilized peoples indicated their reprobation of the same. Ships were sunk and American citizens killed upon the high seas. The situation reached such a climax of injustice and wrong on the part of Germany and her associates that our President came before the assembled Senate and House and read that great message which resulted in this Republic becoming a participant in the conflict. I voted in favor of the President's recommendation, as did substantially all of the Members of the House and the Senate. There was substantial unanimity on the part of the American people, and they rallied with earnestness behind him and supported the measures which were recommended in order to prepare our Nation to play an important part in the conflict.

Of course war is terrible. The consequences of war persist for an indefinite period. The part our country played in the war was most important. Indeed, I think it may be said that it was the deciding factor in that terrible conflict. War, however, brings woe and sorrow. Even the victors pay heavy penalties for their triumphs, and our country will be discharging obligations incurred in the war long after we have passed from this field of action. Our children and grandchildren will bear heavy burdens resulting from a conflict perhaps the greatest of all time.

However, Mr. President, there are things in this world more important than money or property or even life itself. I refer to honor and liberty and the perpetuity to those priceless principles which in the end must prevail if civilization is to be preserved. The American people joined in a cause which they believed represented justice and liberty and righteousness and the moral and spiritual principles which must persist if a reversion to barbarism is to be averted.

DUTIES ON CERTAIN IMPORTS TO NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR AND GOLDEN GATE INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which was reported today by the Committee on Finance by unanimous vote. I refer to House bill 5287.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the title of the bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 5287) relating to the importation of distilled spirits for consumption at the New York World's Fair, 1939, and the Golden Gate International Exposition of 1939, and to duties on certain articles to be exhibited at the New York World's Fair, 1939.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance, with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 10, after the word "of", to strike out "the joint resolution approved June 18, 1934, entitled 'Joint resolution to protect the revenue by regulation of the traffic in containers of distilled spirits'," and insert "section 2871 of the Internal Revenue Code"; and on page 5, at the beginning of line 20, to strike out "Sec. 4. Unbound books of all kinds, bound books of all kinds except those wholly or in part in leather, sheets or printed pages of books bound wholly or in part in leather, pamphlets, music in books or sheets, and printed matter" and insert "Sec. 4. Tourist literature containing scenic, historical, geographic, time table, travel, hotel, or similar information, chiefly with respect to places or travel facilities outside the continental United States", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal Alcohol Administration Act, as amended, shall not apply to the importation, for the account of a foreign government, of distilled spirits, wine, or malt beverages produced in its own country, for on-premises consumption in the national pavilion restaurant of such foreign government at the New York World's Fair, 1939, or at the Golden Gate International Exposition of 1939; nor shall regulations 13 under the provisions of section 2871 of the Internal Revenue Code apply to such importation, if such distilled spirits, wine, or malt beverages are entered for customs purposes in the name of the duly authorized representative of the national pavilion restaurant of the foreign government responsible for the importation: Provided, That the individual containers of all such distilled spirits, wine, or malt beverages shall, prior to release from customs custody, have firmly affixed thereto a label stating the country of origin of such beverages, and bearing a statement to the effect that the same have been imported solely for consumption at the New York World's Fair, 1939, or the Golden Gate International Exposition of 1939, as the case may be: Provided further, That the removal from the premises of any national pavilion restaurant of any distilled spirits, wine, or malt beverages imported under the provisions of this act for on-premises consumption in such national pavilion is forbidden otherwise than for destruction or exportation under customs supervision, and in the event any of the distilled spirits, wine, or malt beverages so imported are not consumed upon the premises of the national pavilion restaurant and are removed from such premises for consumption or for sale or other commercial purposes in the United States, such distilled spirits, wine, and malt beverages so removed shall be seized and forfeited. All distilled spirits, wine, and malt beverages removed in violation of this proviso, the containers thereof, and every vehicle or vessel used in the transportation thereof, shall be seized and forfeited. Such seizure and forfeiture, and the disposition of such property subsequent to seizure and forfeiture, or the disposition of the proceeds from the sale of such property, shall be in accordance with existing laws or those hereafter in existence relating to seizures, forfeitures, and dispositions of property or proceeds, for violation of the internal-revenue laws: And provided further, That nothing in this section shall authorize the importation of distilled spirits in containers of larger than 1 gallon capacity.

SEC. 2. The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to permit articles imported from foreign countries for the purpose of exhibition at the New York World's Fair, 1939, New York City, N. Y., to be admitted without payment of tariff, and for other purposes," approved August 16, 1937 (50 Stat. 668), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of the last proviso to the foregoing section, the New York World's Fair, 1939, Inc., shall not be liable for the payment of duty on articles imported under this joint resolution, to be exhibited or used by or for the account of a foreign government, if (a) the New York World's Fair, 1939, Inc., declares at the time of entry that the articles are to be so exhibited or used; (b) the New York World's Fair, 1939, Inc., furnishes to the appropriate collector of customs the name and address of the duly authorized commissioner of the foreign government by which or for whose account the articles are to be so exhibited or used; and (c) the New York World's Fair, 1939, Inc., within 30 days from the date of entry furnishes to the appropriate collector of customs a declaration of such duly authorized commissioner that his government will pay all duties, taxes, and other charges accruing on such articles, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Such commissioner shall possess all the rights of a consignee. This section shall remain in full force and effect until 90 days after the final termination of the New York World's Fair."

SEC. 3. The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the importation of articles free from tariff or other customs duty for the purpose of exhibition at the Golden Gate International Exposition, to be held at San Francisco, Calif., in 1939, and for other purposes," approved May 18, 1937 (50 Stat. 187), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. Notwithstanding the provisions of the last proviso to the foregoing section, the San Francisco Bay Exposition shall not be liable for the payment of duty on articles imported under this joint resolution, to be exhibited or used by or for the account of a foreign government, if (a) the San Francisco Bay Exposition declares at the time of entry that the articles are to be so exhibited or used; (b) the San Francisco Bay Exposition furnishes to the appropriate collector of customs the name and address of the duly authorized commissioner of the foreign government by which or for whose account the articles are to be so exhibited or used; and (c) the San Francisco Bay Exposition within 30 days from the date of entry furnishes to the appropriate collector of customs a declaration of such duly authorized commissioner that his government will pay all duties, taxes, and other charges accruing on such articles under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Such commissioner shall possess all the rights of a consignee. This section shall remain in full force and effect until 90 days after the final termination of the Golden Gate International Exposition."

SEC. 4. Tourist literature containing scenic, historical, geographic, timetable, travel, hotel, or similar information, chiefly with respect to places or travel facilities outside the continental United States, all the foregoing, if their entry is not prohibited, and if of bona fide foreign authorship and classifiable under paragraph 1410 of the Tariff Act of 1930, shall be admitted without payment of duty if imported for gratuitous distribution within the exhibits of foreign governments at the New York World's Fair, 1939.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR LEWIS

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 121, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 121) submitted by Mr. LUCAS on April 13, 1939, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of Hon. James Hamilton Lewis, late a Senator from the State of Illinois, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MALONEY in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the nomination of Alexander W. Weddell, of Virginia, now Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Argentina, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Spain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for promotions in the Army.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the Army nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Army nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn under the order previously made.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock p. m.), under the order previously entered, the Senate adjourned until Thursday, April 27, 1939, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, APRIL 25, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., pastor of the Gunton-Temple Memorial Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, God of all grace and goodness, from whom our spirits have come, unto whom we belong, and in whose service is our peace, lift upon us the light of Thy countenance, that we may see our duties more clearly, understand them more wisely, and perform them more faithfully.

Bless Thy servants. In these perilous and difficult days, direct their minds and hearts by Thine own eternal guidance. Beyond the fallibility of human thought, give them divine wisdom. Fill us with a burning passion to see the righteousness of God flow everywhere as a mighty stream.

We pray that Thou wilt lift the nations of the earth into the loftier altitudes of the spirit of good will and peace. Hasten that blessed day of prediction, when it shall be the goal of all our aspirations to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with our God.

In the name of Christ we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

COMMITTEE ON LABOR—LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF HOUSE

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor may be permitted to sit this afternoon during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONDITION OF BUSINESS

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, I have received a notification from a good businessman in Wisconsin who writes me as follows:

For God's sake do something. We are hanging on by an eyelash and day after day passes with no hope from Washington.

Our customers cannot invest in our equipment until the Wagner Act has been overhauled; until the excess-profits and capital-gains taxes have been modified so as to encourage capital expenditures; until the everlasting spending of money is stopped and a fair break given to management as well as labor. The Catlin labor bill just passed in Wisconsin could well be a model for Federal legislation.

Will you please write and advise what chance there is of sane legislation?

Mr. Roosevelt challenges you this morning; now is your chance to show whether our legislators are mice or men.

I want to reply to my correspondent, and if there is any Member in Congress that has any suggestions to offer as to an answer to this letter, I would be glad to have such advice.

I also have another letter from a fur producer in Wisconsin who says that he is 100 percent against the President's good-neighbor policy to allow foreign fur farmers to prosper at the expense of our own producers. He states that at the present time he is only interested in mink-pelt production but desires to start now to protect mink producers from what has already been done to the fox producers.

He further informs me that it would interest you to know that a marked increase in imports of silver foxes into this country during January 1939 is shown in the figures released by the Department of Commerce. Arrival of silver-fox skins in January 1939 totaled 14,232 as compared with 3,315 in the like month of 1938. Average value for imported skins in January 1938 was $33.06 while in 1939 the average was only $26. This heavy increase in silver-fox imports is attributed to the lowering of the tariff to 37½ percent ad valorem on January 1. The imports were heaviest from Canada, although Norway shipped about 25 percent of the skins received.

He assures the delegation from Wisconsin that they have a big job on their hands to protect the fur industry of this country. He also advises, which is a surprise, that Wisconsin's fur industry produced 52 percent of all the fox and mink pelts raised in the United States in 1937, which brought to the State almost 55 percent of the industry's national income. He also advises that reports indicate that out of a total of 396,463 fox and mink pelts produced in the United States in 1937, Wisconsin produced 206,504. The total income from the pelts for the entire country in 1937 was $9,932,556, with the total from Wisconsin alone amounting to $5,456,640.

This report also reveals that the State's income from furs is almost equal to the combined income from tobacco and canning of peas, of which we produce a large amount of canned peas, and also the combined income from spring and winter wheat, alfalfa seed, market and kraut cabbage, sugar beets, clover seed, and canned corn. The domestic fur industry does not compete in any way with agricultural products, but instead is of direct benefit to agricultural products, in that it affords a significant and desirable market for various products. The fur industry has also helped to rehabilitate marginal and submarginal lands by the establishment of fur farms on such acreage.

My correspondent feels that the tariff on fur should not only be restored to the previous tariff rate but should be increased at least to 75 percent.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 262)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Select Committee on Government Organization and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of the Reorganization Act of 1939 (Public, No. 19, 76th Cong., 1st sess.) approved April 3, 1939, I herewith transmit reorganization plan No. I which, after investigation, I have prepared in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of the act, and I declare that with respect to each transfer, consolidation, or abolition made in reorganization plan No. I, I have found that such transfer, consolidation, or abolition is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes of section 1 (a) of the act.

In these days of ruthless attempts to destroy democratic government, it is baldly asserted that democracies must always be weak in order to be democratic at all, and that, therefore, it will be easy to crush all free states out of existence.

Confident in our Republic's 150 years of successful resistance to all subversive attempts upon it, whether from without or within, nevertheless we must be constantly alert to the importance of keeping the tools of American democracy up to date. It is our responsibility to make sure that the people's Government is in condition to carry out the people's will promptly, effectively, without waste or lost motion.

In 1883 under President Arthur we strengthened the machinery of democracy by the civil-service law; beginning in 1905 President Roosevelt initiated important inquiries into Federal administration; in 1911 President Taft named the Economy and Efficiency Commission which made very important recommendations; in 1921 under Presidents Wilson and Harding we tightened up our budgetary procedure. Presidents Theodore Roosevelt, Taft, Wilson, Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover in succession strongly recommended the rearrangement of Federal administrative activities. In 1937 I proposed, on the basis of an inquiry authorized and appropriated for by the Congress, the strengthening of the administrative management of the executive establishment.

None of all this long series of suggestions, running over more than a quarter of a century, was in any sense personal or partisan in design.

These measures have all had only one supreme purpose—to make democracy work—to strengthen the arms of democracy in peace or war and to insure the solid blessings of free government to our people in increasing measure.

We are not free if our administration is weak. But we are free if we know, and others know, that we are strong; that we can be tough as well as tender-hearted, and that what the American people decide to do can and will be done, capably and effectively, with the best national equipment that modern organizing ability can supply in a country where management and organization is so well understood in private affairs.

My whole purpose in submitting this plan is to improve the administrative management of the Republic, and I feel confident that our Nation is united in this central purpose, regardless of differences upon details.

This plan is concerned with the practical necessity of reducing the number of agencies which report directly to the President and also of giving the President assistance in dealing with the entire executive branch by modern means of administrative management.

Forty years ago, in 1899, President McKinley could deal with the whole machinery of the executive branch through his eight Cabinet Secretaries and the heads of two commissions; and there was but one commission of the so-called quasi-judicial type in existence. He could keep in touch with all the work through 8 or 10 persons.

Now, 40 years later, not only do some 30 major agencies (to say nothing of the minor ones) report directly to the President, but there are several quasi-judicial bodies which have enough administrative work to require them also to see him on important executive matters.

It has become physically impossible for one man to see so many persons, to receive reports directly from them, and to attempt to advise them on their own problems which they submit. In addition, the President today has the task of trying to keep their programs in step with each other or in line with the national policy laid down by the Congress. And he must seek to prevent unnecessary duplication of effort.

The administrative assistants provided for the President in the Reorganization Act cannot perform these functions of over-all management and direction. Their task will be to help me get information, and condense and summarize it—they are not to become in any sense Assistant Presidents nor are they to have any authority over anybody in any department or agency.

The only way in which the President can be relieved of the physically impossible task of directly dealing with 30 or 40 major agencies is by reorganization—by the regrouping of agencies according to their major purposes under responsible heads who will report to the President, just as is contemplated by the Reorganization Act of 1939.

This act says that the President shall investigate the organization of all agencies of the Government and determine what changes are necessary to accomplish any one or more of five definite purposes:

(1) To reduce expenditures.

(2) To increase efficiency.

(3) To consolidate agencies according to major purposes.

(4) To reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions and by abolishing such as may not be necessary.

(5) To eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort.

It being obviously impracticable to complete this task at one time, but, having due regard to the declaration of Congress that it should be accomplished immediately and speedily, I have decided to undertake it promptly in several steps.

The first step is to improve over-all management, that is to do those things which will accomplish the purposes set out in the law, and which, at the same time, will reduce the difficulties of the President in dealing with the multifarious agencies of the executive branch and assist him in distributing his responsibilities as the chief administrator of the Government by providing him with the necessary organization and machinery for better administrative management.

The second step is to improve the allocation of departmental activities, that is, to do those things which will accomplish the purposes set out in the law and at the same time help that part of the work of the executive branch which is carried on through executive departments and agencies. In all this the responsibility to the people is through the President.

The third step is to improve intradepartmental management, that is, to do those things which will enable the heads of departments and agencies the better to carry out their own duties and distribute their own work among their several assistants and subordinates.

Each of these three steps may require from time to time the submission of one or more plans involving one or more reorganizations, but it is my purpose to fulfill the duty imposed upon me by the Congress as expeditiously as practicable and to the fullest extent possible in view of the exceptions and exemptions set out in the act.

The plan I now transmit is divided into four parts, or sections, which I shall describe briefly, as follows:

PART 1. EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

In my message to the Congress of January 12, 1937, in discussing the problem of how to improve the administrative management of the executive branch, I transmitted with my approval certain recommendations for strengthening and developing the management arms of the President. Those three management arms deal with (1) budget and efficiency research, (2) planning, and (3) personnel. My accumulated experience during the 2 years since that time has deepened my conviction that it is necessary for the President to have direct access to these managerial agencies in order that he may have the machinery to enable him to carry out his constitutional responsibility and in order that he may be able to control expenditures, to increase efficiency, to eliminate overlapping and duplication of effort, and to be able to get the information which will permit him the better to advise the Congress concerning the state of the Union and the program of the Government.

Therefore I find it necessary and desirable in carrying out the purposes of the act to transfer the Bureau of the Budget to the Executive Office of the President from the Treasury Department. It is apparent from the legislative history of the Budget and Accounting Act that it was the purpose in 1921 to set up an executive budget for which the President would be primarily responsible to the Congress and to the people, and that the Director of the Budget was to act under the immediate direction and supervision of the President. While no serious difficulties have been encountered because of the fact that the Bureau of the Budget was placed in the Treasury Department so far as making budgetary estimates has been concerned, it is apparent that its coordinating activities and its research and investigational activities recently provided for by the Congress will be facilitated if the Bureau is not a part of one of the 10 executive departments. Also, in order that the Bureau of the Budget may the better carry out its work of coordination and investigation, I find it desirable and necessary in order to accomplish the purposes of the act to transfer to the Bureau of the Budget the functions of the Central Statistical Board.

By these transfers to the Executive Office the President will be given immediate access to that managerial agency which is concerned with the preparation and administration of the Budget, with the coordination of the work of the governmental agencies, and with research and investigation necessary to accomplish the five definite purposes of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

I also find it necessary and desirable to transfer to the Executive Office of the President the National Resources Committee, now an independent establishment, and to consolidate with it by transfer from the Department of Commerce the functions of the Federal Employment Stabilization Office, the consolidated unit to be known as the National Resources Planning Board. This Board would be made up as is the present advisory board of the National Resources Committee of citizens giving part-time services to the Government, who, aided by their technical staff, would be able to advise the President, the Congress, and the people with respect to plans and programs for the conservation of the national resources, physical and human. By these transfers to the Executive Office, the President will be given more direct access to and immediate direction over that agency, which is concerned with planning for the utilization and conservation of the national resources, an indispensable part of the equipment of the Chief Executive.

On previous occasions I have recommended and I hereby renew and emphasize my recommendation that the work of this Board be placed upon a permanent statutory basis.

Because of an exemption in the act it is impossible to transfer to the Executive Office the administration of the third managerial function of the Government, that of personnel. However, I desire to inform the Congress that it is my purpose to name one of the administrative assistants to the President, authorized in the Reorganization Act of 1939, to serve as a liaison agent of the White House on personnel management.

In this manner the President will be given for the first time direct access to the three principal necessary management agencies of the Government. None of the three belongs in any existing department. With their assistance, and with this reorganization, it will be possible for the President to continue the task of making investigations of the organization of the Government in order to control expenditures, increase efficiency, and eliminate overlapping.

PART 2. FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY

Studies heretofore made by me and researches made at my direction, as well as recommendations submitted by me to the Congress, and especially those contained in my message of January 12, 1937, indicate clearly that to carry out the purposes of the Reorganization Act of 1939 to group, coordinate, and consolidate agencies of the Government according to major purposes and to reduce the number of agencies by consolidating those having similar functions under a single head, would require the provision of 3 general agencies in addition to the 10 executive departments.

It is my objective, then, by transfer, consolidation, and abolition, to set up a Federal Security Agency, a Federal Works Agency, and a Federal Loan Agency, and then to distribute among the 10 executive departments and these 3 new agencies the major independent establishments in the Government—excepting those exempt from the operations of the act—in order to minimize overlapping and duplication, to increase efficiency, and to reduce expenditures to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient operation of the Government.

I find it necessary and desirable to group in a Federal Security Agency those agencies of the Government the major purposes of which are to promote social and economic security, educational opportunity, and the health of the citizens of the Nation.

The agencies to be grouped are the Social Security Board, now an independent establishment; the United States Employment Service, now in the Department of Labor; the Office of Education, now in the Department of the Interior; the Public Health Service, now in the Treasury Department; the National Youth Administration, now in the Works Progress Administration; and the Civilian Conservation Corps, now an independent agency.

The Social Security Board is placed under the Federal Security Agency, and at the same time the United States Employment Service is transferred from the Department of Labor and consolidated with the unemployment-compensation functions of the Social Security Board in order that their similar and related functions of social and economic security may be placed under a single head and their internal operations simplified and integrated.

The unemployment compensation functions of the Social Security Board and the employment service of the Department of Labor are concerned with the same problem, that of the employment or the unemployment of the individual worker.

Therefore they deal necessarily with the same individual. These particular services to the particular individual also are bound up with the public-assistance activities of the Social Security Board. Not only will these similar functions be more efficiently and economically administered at the Federal level by such grouping and consolidation, but this transfer and merger also will be to the advantage of the administration of State social-security programs and result in considerable saving of money in the administrative costs of the governments of the 48 States as well as those of the United States.

In addition to this saving of money there will be a considerable saving of time and energy not only on the part of administrative officials concerned with this program in both Federal and State Governments, but also on the part of employers and workers, permitting through the simplification of procedures a reduction in the number of reports required and the elimination of unnecessary duplication in contacts with workers and with employers.

Because of the relationship of the educational opportunities of the country to the security of its individual citizens, the Office of Education with all of its functions, including, of course, its administration of Federal-State programs of vocational education, is transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Federal Security Agency. This transfer does not increase or extend the activities of the Federal Government in respect to education, but does move the existing activities into a grouping where the work may be carried on more efficiently and expeditiously, and where coordination and the elimination of overlapping may be better accomplished. The Office of Education has no relationship to the other functions of the Department of the Interior.

The Public Health Service is transferred from the Treasury Department to the Federal Security Agency. It is obvious that the health activities of the Federal Government may be better carried out when so grouped than if they are left in the Treasury, which is primarily a fiscal agency, and where the necessary relationships with other social security, employment, and educational activities now must be carried on by an elaborate scheme of interdepartmental committee work.

The National Youth Administration is transferred from the Works Progress Administration to the Federal Security Agency since its major purpose is to extend the educational opportunities of the youth of the country and to bring them through the processes of training into the possession of skills which enable them to find employment. Other divisions of the Federal Security Agency will have the task of finding jobs, providing for unemployment compensation and other phases of social security, while still other units of the new agency will be concerned with the problem of primary and secondary education, as well as vocational education and job training and retraining for employment. While much of the work of the National Youth Administration has been carried on through work projects, these have been merely the process through which its major purpose was accomplished, and, therefore, this agency under the terms of the act should be grouped with the other security agencies rather than with the work agencies.

For similar reasons the Civilian Conservation Corps, now an independent establishment, is placed under the Federal Security Agency because of the fact that its major purpose is to promote the welfare and further the training of the individuals who make up the corps, important as may be the construction work which they have carried on so successfully. The Civilian Conservation Corps is a small coordinating agency which supervises work carried on with the cooperation of several regular departments and independent units of the Government. This transfer would not interfere with the plan of work heretofore carried on but it would enable the Civilian Conservation Corps to coordinate its policies, as well as its operations, with those other agencies of the Government concerned with the educational and health activities and with human security.

PART 3. FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY

In order to carry out the purpose of the Reorganization Act of 1939 I find it necessary and desirable to group and consolidate under a Federal Works Agency those agencies of the Federal Government dealing with public works not incidental to the normal work of other departments, and which administer Federal grants or loans to State and local governments or other agencies for the purposes of construction.

The agencies so to be grouped are: The Bureau of Public Roads, now in the Department of Agriculture; the Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division, now in the Treasury Department; and the branch of building management of the National Park Service (so far as it is concerned with public buildings which it operates for other departments or agencies), now in the Department of the Interior; the United States Housing Authority, now in the Department of the Interior; the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works (familiarly known as P. W. A.); and the Works Progress Administration (familiarly known as W. P. A.) except the functions of the National Youth Administration.

The transfer of both the Public Works Administration and the Works Progress Administration to the new Federal Works Agency would provide for both principal types of public works that have been carried on by the Federal Government directly or in cooperation with the State and local governments. I find that it will be possible to reduce administrative costs as well as to improve efficiency and to eliminate overlapping by bringing these different programs of public works under a common head. But, because of the differences that justified their separate operation in the past and differences that will continue in the future to distinguish certain phases of major public works from work relief, I find it necessary to maintain them at least for the present as separate subordinate units of the Federal Works Agency.

The present Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works is placed under the Federal Works Agency under the shorter name of Public Works Administration.

The name of the Works Progress Administration has been changed to Work Projects Administration in order to make its title more descriptive of its major purpose.

The Bureau of Public Roads is transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Federal Works Agency and as a separate unit under the name of Public Roads Administration. This will bring the administration of the Federal roads program, with its grants-in-aid to the States, into coordination with other major public-works programs and other programs of grants and loans to the States.

The construction and operation of many public buildings is now carried on in two agencies which are consolidated under the new Federal Works Agency, namely, the Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department, which is concerned with the construction of Federal buildings and with the operation of many public buildings outside the District of Columbia, and the Branch of Building Management of the National Park Service, of the Department of the Interior, which is concerned with the operation of public buildings in the District of Columbia. These two separate activities are consolidated in one unit to be known as the Public Buildings Administration. Improved efficiency, coordination of effort, and savings will result from this transfer and consolidation.

Then, also, there is transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Federal Works Agency the United States Housing Authority The major purpose of the United States Housing Authority is to administer grants-in-aid and loans to local public-housing authorities in accordance with its established standards of construction in that part of the housing field which cannot be reached economically by private enterprise. For these reasons it should be grouped with those other agencies which have to do with public works, with grants and loans to State and local governments, and with construction practices and standards.

PART 4. FEDERAL LOAN AGENCY AND TRANSFERS OF INDEPENDENT LENDING AGENCIES

In order to carry out the purposes of the Reorganization Act of 1939 I find it necessary and desirable to group under a Federal Loan Agency those independent lending agencies of the Government which have been established from time to time for the purpose of stimulating and stabilizing the financial, commercial, and industrial enterprises of the Nation.

The agencies to be so grouped in the Federal Loan Agency are the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Electric Home and Farm Authority, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Federal Housing Administration, and their associated agencies and boards, as well as the Export-Import Bank of Washington.

Since 1916 the Congress has established from time to time agencies for providing loans, directly or indirectly, for the stimulation and stabilization of agriculture, and such agencies should, in my opinion, be grouped with the other agricultural activities of the Government. For that reason I find it necessary and desirable to accomplish the purposes of the act to transfer the Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, and the Commodity Credit Corporation and associated agencies to the Department of Agriculture.

ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY

One of the five purposes of the Reorganization Act of 1939 is "to reduce expenditures to the fullest extent consistent with the efficient operation of the Government." This purpose is important in each phase of the plan here presented. The Reorganization Act prohibits abolishing functions—in other words, basic services or activities performed. Therefore the reduction in expenditures to be effected must necessarily be brought about chiefly in the overhead administrative expenses of the agencies set up to perform certain functions. The chance for economy arises, therefore, not from stopping work but from organizing the work and the overhead more efficiently in combination with other similar activities. Only the Congress can abolish or curtail functions now provided by law.

The overhead administrative costs of all the agencies affected in reorganization plan No. I is about $235,000,000. This does not include the loans they make, the benefits they pay, the wages of the unemployed who have been given jobs; it does not include the loans and grants to States or, in short, the functional expense. It does include the overhead expense of operating and administering all these agencies.

The reduction of administrative expenditures which it is probable will be brought about by the taking effect of the reorganizations specified in the plan is estimated, as nearly as may be, at between $15,000,000 and $20,000,000 annually, a substantial lowering of the existing overhead. Certain of these economies can be brought about almost immediately; others will require a painstaking and gradual readjustment in the machinery and business practices of the Government.

Any such estimate is incomplete, however, without reference to the corresponding savings which will follow in the States and cities through the recommended consolidation of the Federal services with which they cooperate, and the improved efficiency and convenience which will be felt by citizens all over the Nation, many of whom will be able to find in a single office many of the services now scattered in several places. These economies will undoubtedly exceed the direct savings in the Federal Budget.

It will not be necessary to ask the Congress for any additional appropriations for the administrative expenses of the three consolidated agencies set up in this plan, since their costs will be met from funds now available for the administrative expenses of their component units. Actually, new expenses will be only a fractional part of the expected savings.

Neither on this reorganization plan No. I nor on future reorganization plans covering interdepartmental changes and intradepartmental changes will every person agree on each and every detail. It is true that out of the many groupings and regroupings proposed in this message a few of the individual agencies could conceivably be placed elsewhere.

Nevertheless, I have been seeking to consider the functional origin and purpose of each agency as required by the reorganization bill itself.

If in the future experience shows that one or two of them should be regrouped, it will be wholly possible for the President and the Congress to make the change.

The plan presented herewith represents 2 years of study. It is a simple and easily understood plan. It conforms to methods of executive administration used by large private enterprises which are engaged in many lines of production. Finally, it will save a sum of money large in comparison with the existing overhead of the agencies involved.

I trust, therefore, that the Congress will view the plan as a whole and make it possible to take the first step in improving the executive administration of the Government of the United States.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1939.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. I

Prepared by the President and transmitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, April 25, 1939, pursuant to the provisions of the Reorganization Act of 1939, approved April 3, 1939

PART 1. EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

SECTION 1. Bureau of the Budget: The Bureau of the Budget and all of its functions and personnel (including the Director and Assistant Director) are hereby transferred from the Treasury Department to the Executive Office of the President; and the functions of the Bureau of the Budget shall be administered by the Director thereof under the direction and supervision of the President.

SEC. 2. Central Statistical Board: The Central Statistical Board and all of its functions and personnel (including the chairman and the members of the Board) are hereby transferred to the Bureau of the Budget in the Executive Office of the President. The chairman of the Board shall perform such administrative duties as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall direct.

SEC. 3. Central Statistical Committee abolished and functions transferred: The Central Statistical Committee is hereby abolished, and its functions are transferred to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget to be administered by him under the direction and supervision of the President. The Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall promptly wind up any outstanding affairs of the Central Statistical Committee.

SEC. 4. National Resources Planning Board: (a) The functions of the National Resources Committee, established by Executive Order No. 7065 of June 7, 1935, and its personnel (except the members of the committee) and all of the functions of the Federal Employment Stabilization Office in the Department of Commerce and its personnel are hereby transferred to the Executive Office of the President. The functions transferred by this section are hereby consolidated, and they shall be administered under the direction and supervision of the President by the National Resources Planning Board (hereafter referred to as the Board), which shall be composed of five members to be appointed by the President. The President shall designate one of the members of the Board as chairman and another as vice chairman. The vice chairman shall act as chairman in the absence of the chairman or in the event of a vacancy in that office. The members of the Board shall be compensated at the rate of $50 per day for time spent in attending and traveling to and from meetings or in otherwise exercising the functions and duties of the Board, plus the actual cost of transportation: Provided, That in no case shall a member be entitled to receive compensation for more than 30 days' service in 2 consecutive months.

(b) The Board shall determine the rules of its own proceedings, and a majority of its members in office shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but the Board may function notwithstanding vacancies.

(c) The Board may appoint necessary officers and employees and may delegate to such officers authority to perform such duties and make such expenditures as may be necessary.

SEC. 5. National Resources Committee abolished: The National Resources Committee is hereby abolished and its outstanding affairs shall be wound up by the National Resources Planning Board.

SEC. 6. Federal Employment Stabilization Office abolished: The Federal Employment Stabilization Office is hereby abolished and the Secretary of Commerce shall promptly wind up its affairs.

SEC. 7. Transfer of records and property: All records and property (including office equipment) of the several agencies transferred, or the functions of which are transferred, by this part are hereby transferred to the Executive Office of the President for use in the administration of the agencies and functions transferred by this part.

SEC. 8. Transfer of funds: So much of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the use of any agency in the exercise of any functions transferred by this part, or for the use of the head of any department or agency in the exercise of any functions so transferred, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine, shall be transferred to the Executive Office of the President for use in connection with the exercise of functions transferred by this part. In determining the amount to be transferred the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer: Provided, That the use of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds transferred by this section shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 (d) (3) and section 9 of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

SEC. 9. Personnel: Any personnel transferred by this part found to be in excess of the personnel necessary for the efficient administration of the functions transferred by this part shall be retransferred under existing law to other positions in the Government service, or separated from the service subject to the provisions of section 10 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

PART 2. FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY

SECTION 201. Federal Security Agency: (a) The United States Employment Service in the Department of Labor and its functions and personnel are transferred from the Department of Labor; the Office of Education in the Department of the Interior and its functions and personnel (including the Commissioner of Education) are transferred from the Department of the Interior; the Public Health Service in the Department of the Treasury and its functions and personnel (including the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service) are transferred from the Department of the Treasury; the National Youth Administration within the Works Progress Administration and its functions and personnel (including its Administrator) are transferred from the Works Progress Administration; and these agencies and their functions, together with the Social Security Board and its functions, and the Civilian Conservation Corps and its functions, are hereby consolidated under one agency to be known as the Federal Security Agency, with a Federal Security Administrator at the head thereof. The Federal Security Administrator shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $12,000 per annum. He shall have general direction and supervision over the administration of the several agencies consolidated into the Federal Security Agency by this section and shall be responsible for the coordination of their functions and activities.

(b) The Federal Security Administrator shall appoint an Assistant Federal Security Administrator, who shall receive a salary at the rate of $9,000 per annum, and he may also appoint such other personnel and make such expenditures as may be necessary.

(c) The Assistant Administrator shall act as Administrator during the absence or disability of the Administrator or in the event of a vacancy in that office, and shall perform such other duties as the Administrator shall direct.

(d) The several agencies and functions consolidated by this section into the Federal Security Agency shall carry with them their personnel.

SEC. 202. Social Security Board: The Social Security Board and its functions shall be administered as a part of the Federal Security Agency under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator. The Chairman of the Social Security Board shall perform such administrative duties as the Federal Security Administrator shall direct.

SEC. 203. United States Employment Service: (a) The functions of the United States Employment Service shall be consolidated with the unemployment-compensation functions of the Social Security Board and shall be administered in the Social Security Board in connection with such unemployment-compensation functions under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

(b) The office of the Director of the United States Employment Service is hereby abolished, and all of the functions of such office are transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Social Security Board.

(c) All functions of the Secretary of Labor relating to the administration of the United States Employment Service are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 204. Office of Education: (a) The Office of Education and its functions shall be administered by the Commissioner of Education under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

(b) All functions of the Secretary of the Interior relating to the administration of the Office of Education are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 205. Public Health Service: (a) The Public Health Service and its functions shall be administered by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

(b) All the functions of the Secretary of the Treasury relating to the administration of the Public Health Service, except those functions relating to the acceptance and investment of gifts as authorized by sections 23 (b) and 137 (e), title 42, United States Code, are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 206. National Youth Administration: The National Youth Administration and its functions shall be administered by the National Youth Administrator under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 207. Civilian Conservation Corps: The Civilian Conservation Corps and its functions shall be administered by the Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps under the direction and supervision of the Federal Security Administrator.

SEC. 208. Transfer of records and property: All records and property (including office equipment) of the several agencies which, with their functions, are consolidated by section 201 into the Federal Security Agency are hereby transferred to the jurisdiction and control of the Federal Security Agency for use in the administration of the agencies and functions consolidated by that section.

SEC. 209. Transfer of funds: So much of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) available for the use of any agency in the exercise of any functions transferred by this part, or for the use of the head of any department or agency in the exercise of any functions so transferred, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine, shall be transferred for use in connection with the exercise of the functions transferred by this part. In determining the amount to be transferred the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer: Provided, That the use of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds transferred by this section shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 (d) (3) and section 9 of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

SEC. 210. Administrative funds: The Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall allocate to the Federal Security Agency, from appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the administrative expenses of the agencies and functions consolidated by this part, such sums, and in such proportions, as he may find necessary for the administrative expenses of the Federal Security Agency.

SEC. 211. Personnel: Any personnel transferred by this part found to be in excess of the personnel necessary for the efficient administration of the functions transferred by this part shall be retransferred under existing law to other positions in the Government service, or separated from the service subject to the provisions of section 10 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

PART 3. FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY

SECTION 301. Federal Works Agency: (a) The Bureau of Public Roads in the Department of Agriculture and its functions and personnel (including the Chief thereof) are transferred from the Department of Agriculture; the Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division in the Treasury Department and its functions and personnel are transferred from the Treasury Department; the Branch of Buildings Management of the National Park Service in the Department of the Interior and its functions and personnel (except those relating to monuments and memorials), and the functions of the National Park Service in the District of Columbia in connection with the general assignment of space, the selection of sites for public buildings, and the determination of the priority in which the construction or enlargement of public buildings shall be undertaken, and the personnel engaged exclusively in the administration of such functions, and the United States Housing Authority in the Department of the Interior and its functions and personnel (including the Administrator) are transferred from the Department of the Interior; and all of these agencies and functions, together with the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works and its functions, and all of the Works Progress Administration and its functions (except the National Youth Administration and its functions) are hereby consolidated into one agency to be known as the Federal Works Agency, with a Federal Works Administrator at the head thereof. The Federal Works Administrator shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $12,000 per annum. He shall have general direction and supervision over the administration of the several agencies consolidated into the Federal Works Agency by this section and shall be responsible for the coordination of their functions.

(b) The Federal Works Administrator shall appoint an Assistant Federal Works Administrator, who shall receive a salary at the rate of $9,000 per annum, and he may also appoint such other personnel and make such expenditures as may be necessary.

(c) The Assistant Administrator shall act as Administrator during the absence or disability of the Administrator, or in the event of a vacancy in that office, and shall perform such other duties as the Administrator shall direct.

(d) The several agencies and functions consolidated by this section in the Federal Works Agency shall carry with them their personnel.

SEC. 302. Public Roads Administration: (a) The Bureau of Public Roads and its functions shall be administered as the Public Roads Administration at the head of which shall be the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads whose title shall be changed to Commissioner of Public Roads. Hereafter the Commissioner of Public Roads shall be appointed by the Federal Works Administrator.

(b) All functions of the Secretary of Agriculture relating to the administration of the Bureau of Public Roads are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 303. Public Buildings Administration: (a) The Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division and its functions, the Branch of Buildings Management of the National Park Service and its functions (except those relating to monuments and memorials) and the functions of the National Park Service in the District of Columbia in connection with the general assignment of space, the selection of sites for public buildings, and the determination of the priority in which the construction or enlargement of public buildings shall be undertaken, are hereby consolidated and shall be administered as the Public Buildings Administration, with a Commissioner of Public Buildings at the head thereof. The Commissioner of Public Buildings shall be appointed by the Federal Works Administrator and shall receive a salary at the rate of $9,000 per annum. The Commissioner of Public Buildings shall act under the direction and supervision of the Federal Works Administrator.

(b) All functions of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of Procurement relating to the administration of the Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division and to the selection of location and sites for public buildings, and all functions of the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the National Park Service relating to the administration of the functions of the Branch of Buildings Management and the functions of the National Park Service in the District of Columbia in connection with the general assignment of space, the selection of sites for public buildings, and the determination of the priority in which the construction or enlargement of public buildings shall be undertaken, are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 304. United States Housing Authority: (a) The United States Housing Authority and its functions shall be administered by the United States Housing Administrator under the direction and supervision of the Federal Works Administrator.

(b) All functions of the Secretary of the Interior relating to the administration of the United States Housing Authority are hereby transferred to, and shall be exercised by, the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 305. Public Works Administration: The Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works and its functions shall be administered as the Public Works Administration with a Commissioner of Public Works at the head thereof. The Commissioner of Public Works shall be appointed by the Federal Works Administrator and shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum. The Commissioner of Public Works shall act under the direction and supervision of the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 306. Work Projects Administration: The Works Progress Administration and its functions (except the National Youth Administration and its functions) shall be administered as the Works Projects Administration, with a Commissioner of Work Projects at the head thereof. The Commissioner shall be appointed by the Federal Works Administrator and shall receive a salary at the rate of $10,000 per annum. The Commissioner shall act under the direction and supervision of the Federal Works Administrator.

SEC. 307. Transfer of records and property: All records and property (including office equipment) of the several agencies which, with their functions, are consolidated by section 301 into the Federal Works Agency are hereby transferred to the jurisdiction and control of the Federal Works Agency for use in the administration of the agencies and functions consolidated by that section.

SEC. 308. Transfer of funds: (a) So much of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the use of any agency (except the United States Housing Authority) in the exercise of any functions transferred by this part, or for the use of the head of any department or agency in the exercise of any functions so transferred, and so much of such balances available to the United States Housing Authority for administrative expenses, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine, shall be transferred for use in connection with the exercise of the functions transferred by this part. In determining the amount to be transferred the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer: Provided, That the use of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds transferred by this section shall be subject to the provisions of section 4 (d) (3) and section 9 of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

(b) All unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the use of the United States Housing Authority, other than those transferred by subsection (a) of this section, are hereby transferred with the United States Housing Authority and shall remain available to it for the exercise of its functions.

SEC. 309. Administrative funds: The Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall allocate to the Federal Works Agency, from appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the administrative expenses of the agencies and functions consolidated by section 301, such sums, and in such proportions, as he may find necessary for the administrative expenses of the Federal Works Agency.

SEC. 310. Personnel: Any of the personnel transferred by this part found to be in excess of the personnel necessary for the efficient administration of the functions transferred by this part shall be retransferred under existing law to other positions in the Government service, or separated from the service subject to the provisions of section 10 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

PART 4. LENDING AGENCIES

SECTION 401. (a) Transfers to the Department of Agriculture: The Farm Credit Administration, the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, and the Commodity Credit Corporation, and their functions and activities, together with their respective personnel, records, and property (including office equipment), are hereby transferred to the Department of Agriculture and shall be administered in such Department under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be responsible for the coordination of their functions and activities.

(b) Transfer of administrative funds: So much of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the administrative expenses of any agency transferred by this section, as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall determine, shall be transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture for such use; and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall allocate to the Secretary of Agriculture from such funds, such sums, and in such proportions, as he may find necessary for the administrative expenses of the Secretary of Agriculture in connection with the agencies and functions transferred by this section. In determining the amount to be transferred, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may include an amount to provide for the liquidation of obligations incurred against such appropriations, allocations, or other funds prior to the transfer. The use of the unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds transferred by this subsection shall be subject to the provision of section 4 (d) (3) and section 9 of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

(c) Transfer of other funds: All unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds, other than those mentioned in subsection (b) of this section, available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for any agency transferred by subsection (a) of this section shall be transferred with such agency and shall remain available to it for the exercise of its functions.

(d) Personnel: Any of the personnel transferred by this section to the Department of Agriculture which the Secretary of Agriculture shall find to be in excess of the personnel necessary for the administration of the functions transferred by this section shall be retransferred under existing law to other positions in the Government, or separated from the service subject to the provisions of section 10 (a) of the Reorganization Act of 1939.

SEC. 402. (a) Federal Loan Agency: There shall be at the seat of the government a Federal Loan Agency, with a Federal Loan Administrator at the head thereof. The Federal Loan Administrator shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $12,000 per annum.

(b) Assistant Federal Loan Administrator: The Federal Loan Administrator shall appoint an Assistant Federal Loan Administrator, who shall receive a salary at the rate of $9,000 per annum. The Assistant Administrator shall act as Administrator during the absence of disability of the Administrator, or in the event of a vacancy in that office, and shall perform such other duties as the Administrator shall direct.

(c) Powers and duties of Administrator: The Administrator shall supervise the administration, and shall be responsible for the coordination of the functions and activities of the following agencies: Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Electric Home and Farm Authority, RFC Mortgage Co., Disaster Loan Corporation, Federal National Mortgage Association, Federal Home Loan Bank Board, Home Owners' Loan Corporation, Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, Federal Housing Administration, and Export-Import Bank of Washington. The Administrator may appoint such officers and employees and make such expenditures as may be necessary.

(d) Administrative funds: The Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall allocate to the Federal Loan Agency, from appropriations, allocations, or other funds available (including those available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940) for the administrative expenses of the agencies named in this section, such sums, and in such proportion, as he may find necessary for the administrative expenses of the Federal Loan Agency.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. It is my understanding that the recommendations made by the President must be disapproved by the Congress within 60 days from today. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Should the Congress adjourn before the 60 days has expired, will the President's recommendations become operative within the 60-day period?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read subsection (b) of section 5 of the Reorganization Act:

If the Congress adjourns sine die before the expiration of the 60-day period, a new 60-day period shall begin on the opening day of the next succeeding or regular special session. A similar rule shall be applicable in the case of subsequent adjournments sine die before the expiration of 60 days.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD an article by Rev. O'Brien, of the Newman Foundation, Champaign, Ill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Reserving the right to object, what is the article?

Mr. KNUTSON. It is an article by the Rev. John J. O'Brien, of the Newman Foundation of Champaign, Ill. It has no political significance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri and Mr. SABATH were granted permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States has just submitted his first proposal under the reorganization bill. It must be disapproved by the Congress in whole in order to destroy it.

I wish to call attention to the fact that here in the second proposal there is an attempt to merge two relief activities under the Securities Division. That is the N. Y. A. and the C. C. C., both of which are temporary activities. There is in the third proposal, an attempt to merge the Housing activity and the W. P. A., an emergency activity, and P. W. A., an emergency activity, with the works activity. Those activities should be temporary and should not be merged with anything. We should not attempt to create permanent activities by this kind of consolidation. [Applause.]

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], after listening very carefully to the message that has just been submitted to the Congress, I am convinced that the President has done a magnificent job on this plan. [Applause.] The answer to the question just raised by the gentleman from New York is that under the act itself no reorganization shall have the effect of continuing any agency or function beyond the time when it would have terminated if the reorganization had not been made. Therefore, these temporary agencies, put together in another agency, of course, can only exist so long as the Congress has permitted them to exist, or so long as they may be renewed by the Congress itself. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas desire recognition?

Mr. RAYBURN. I had intended to ask permission to address the House for 1 minute, but the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] has so well answered the statement of the gentleman from New York that it is unnecessary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4630) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 2061. An act for the relief of Ernest O. Robinette and others;

H. R. 2074. An act for the relief of Junius Alexander;

H. R. 2098. An act for the relief of Katherine Patterson; and

H. R. 2320. An act to provide domiciliary care, medical and hospital treatment, and burial benefits to certain veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, and the Boxer Rebellion.

ACQUISITION OF STOCKS OF STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 173.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 173

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5191, a bill to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for armed forces and the civilian population in time of national emergency, and to encourage the development of these resources within the United States, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Military Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

I yield myself 8 minutes at this time.

Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules and, as stated in the resolution, it provides for 3 hours of general debate. It is an open rule for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5191.

I shall not attempt at this time to go into the merits of the bill, which will be fully explained by members of the Committee on Military Affairs, except to say that it provides, as is indicated in the title, "for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for armed forces and the civilian population in time of national emergency, and to encourage the development of these resources within the United States."

There are many of these strategic and critical materials, but most prominent among those which we lack are manganese, chrome, tungsten, tin, and rubber.

Let me emphasize that this bill does not embody a new idea arising out of the present situation in Europe. It is not the child of any war hysteria. It is the fruition of years of study by the Procurement Division of the Treasury, by the Planning Branch in the office of the Assistant Secretary of War and of the General Staff of the Army, and by the War Procurement Planning Section of the Office of Naval Operations of the Navy. It is a plan which has been frequently discussed in the House during the 6 years I have been a Member of the House and doubtless was discussed frequently before. The details of the bill, as I stated, will be discussed at length by the members of the committee.

However, I wish to remind the House of a rather dramatic and tragic incident which happened during the World War the loss of the Cyclops, with a large cargo of manganese which, after all, is the most important of the critical and strategic materials so far as we are concerned. You will readily recall the incident.

In the winter of 1917–18 every steel plant in the United States from coast to coast was running at full capacity to supply steel for new ships to replace submarine losses, for strategic railways behind the lines in France, for munitions, and ever more munitions. The same was true of the steel plants in Germany. The situation is perhaps best epitomized by the statement frequently made at that time by which the steel industry of the United States was referred to under the name of one of the great steel centers of America—namely, Pittsburgh—and the steel industry in Germany was referred to by the name of the great steel center in Germany—namely, Essen. You will recall the expression frequently used at that time, that the war had come to be a contest between the steel industries of the United States and Germany. The common saying was, "It is Pittsburgh against Essen." We know, of course, that Pittsburgh won—but not by any too wide a margin.

Ferromanganese is an essential in the manufacture of modern steel. One of the pressing problems of our steel makers at that time was the shortage of manganese. Although our domestic producers were running at full capacity, they supplied our steel plants in this country with only 30 to 33⅓ percent of the needs of the steel plants of the United States. We were obliged to look elsewhere for the balance of the necessary amount of manganese. One of the sources of supply for the best quality of manganese was and is Russia; but the Dardanelles were fortified by the Turks, and we could not bring manganese from Russia because this passage from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean was blocked.

Domestic production of manganese was running at full capacity, but it did not suffice. Our reserves of manganese were running low. The situation was not merely serious, it was critical.

Further to realize how critical it was we should recall the military situation. Germany was preparing for the Hindenburg drive, which was designed to break through the western front, roll back the allied armies to Paris and beyond, and win the war before the bulk of the American Army could reach France. Those were grim days in February and March of 1918.

Finally arrangements were made by the United States to secure from Brazil a somewhat inferior quality of manganese. A naval auxiliary vessel, the Cyclops, was sent in January of 1918 to Rio de Janeiro to secure a cargo of manganese. In Rio it was loaded with 10,800 tons of manganese and started north, touching at the Barbados, and on March 4, 1918, sailed from the Barbados for Baltimore, where she was due to arrive on March 13, 1918. Neither the Cyclops nor any of the 309 persons making up the officers, crew, and passengers of the ship were heard from again. This absolutely essential cargo of manganese was lost without trace.

Whether the loss of the Cyclops was due to sabotage, whether the ship was torpedoed—which later investigation in Germany seems to indicate is unlikely—or whether the cargo shifted and the ship capsized or broke up and sank is not known. The disappearance of the Cyclops remains one of the unsolved mysteries of the seas.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I will yield in a moment.

This presented a very difficult situation to our steel manufacturers, to the Army, to the Navy, to the allied armies on the western front, which were depending to such a great extent upon the products of our steel mills. Great Britain had a very meager store of manganese at that time, none of which her own steel industry could afford to give up. But the United States arranged to buy from Britain 40,000 tons of ferromanganese at a cost of $400 a ton, which is five times the present price of this material. Had we not been able to get this supply from Great Britain, say the experts in various departments of our Government, our production of steel and munitions would necessarily have been curtailed. Probably it would not have been possible to start the final drive in the early summer of 1918, which, inspired by the presence and participation of the American Army, won the war.

This rather dramatic incident demonstrates what the situation was when all the sea lanes were open—I say all, practically all. It gives us cause to think what might happen if by submarines or airplanes our sea lanes to those countries which produce the major part of these strategic materials which we lack were closed.

I emphasize again that the plan embodied in this bill is not an idea born of the present situation in Europe, but that it is the deliberate conclusion reached after long and careful studies by experts in our Government departments which have been considering the question for many years. It has been the subject of discussion in the House on many occasions.

At this point, in view of the very, very fine report on this bill by the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent to insert the committee's report at this point as part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The report referred to follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5191) to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for armed forces and the civilian population in time of national emergency, and to encourage the development of these resources within the United States, and for other purposes, having considered the same, submit the following report thereon with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee in consideration of this bill, conducted extensive hearings over a period of several weeks, at which various officers and representatives of the War Department, and other Government departments concerned, testified at length, and, after the presentation of much evidence, the committee proceeded into executive session for the consideration of amendments to the bill, and the reported bill is the final result of the hearings and executive consideration of the measure.

The committee, after considering the measure from two principal angles: First, solely as a national-defense measure, and secondly as a measure designed to develop our national resources of strategic raw materials needed for the national-defense program, particularly as shown by the uncontroverted testimony of all witnesses to be an essential means of making the United States independent of foreign sources of strategic raw materials and supplies, reported the bill favorably. We have, however, placed the essential consideration, that is, development of our own natural resources, necessarily as secondary to the important matter of obtaining at the earliest practicable date consistent with the general welfare of the necessary stock piles and supplies of these strategic raw materials.

The War Department has submitted a large amount of evidence emphasizing the needs of the Department for a number of strategic raw materials, and they have placed special emphasis on at least four of them, with manganese at the head of the list because of the fact that steel cannot be produced without adequate supplies of high-grade ferromanganese, and it is so well known that we are practically destitute of any known or discovered resources of tin and rubber, that your committee believes that the particular in which the measure provides for the acquisition of any or all of these strategic supplies from foreign sources is a wise conclusion and in harmony with the needs of national defense at this particular time when there is so much discord and military activity in European countries.

The committee has written into the bill a declaration of congressional policy, the effect of which is to encourage as far as consistent to do so, the discovery and development of the sources of raw material in this country, and it is felt that the situation is similar to that which requires the placing of what is known as "educational orders" with dormant and inactive factories.

The principle involved being by the placing of educational orders with factories adapted to the production of noncommercial articles, that is, those not of commercial value other than in the national-defense picture; and it is likewise felt that, inasmuch as such strategic and critical materials as manganese, tungsten, tin, and rubber are now very largely obtained from foreign sources, if a general war, which is not at this time unlikely, should occur, the lines of trade and commerce with foreign countries might be severed to such extent as to compel this country, in case of a national emergency, to resort entirely to domestic production of these vital necessities; and it is felt that, while the money authorized to be appropriated in the bill ($100,000,000) is being used, at least a sufficient portion of it should be allocated to the letting of contracts for high-grade ferromanganese, tin, and chrome from domestic deposits where possible, and thus obtain for stockpile requirements as much as possible of the supplies from domestic sources and thereby encourage development of our domestic industries so as to make it possible in the event of a national emergency to procure the needed supplies from domestic sources.

In an abstract report by the Bureau of Mines, printed in the record of the hearings, and which the committee has had occasion to give considerable study, that Department makes this statement:

"The present international situation brings sharply to attention the problem of strategic or deficient minerals. The position of the United States with respect to them is now far more acute than at any other time in its history. Since the World War a great deal of publicity has been given to this question but, with minor exceptions, nothing tangible has been accomplished in solving it despite its importance as an element in national security. Heretofore efforts to overcome our dependence on foreign sources of certain basic mineral raw materials have been limited to encouragement of domestic industries under tariff protection, but this method has not produced results."

Evidence before your committee as well as before the Senate committee of a very substantial character discloses that a vast quantity of some of these materials exists in some 15 or 20 of our States, and that during the World War, when prices were high, the domestic industries, particularly the manganese industry, was encouraged to make further and additional development of their mines and properties that production of manganese in particular, which is regarded by the committee and by the War Department as strategic mineral No. 1 in matter of importance, rose from a domestic production of 2,635 tons in 1914, with 31 producers engaged in the industry, and within the 3 years thereafter, going up to 1918, the production went up from this small tonnage to 305,869 tons, and the number of producers from 31 to 247, and this is quite convincing that if the industry, then in its infancy, practically dormant, could revive to that extent, that with modern equipment and machinery now available from many sources, and with trial orders sufficient to give encouragement to further development, our domestic sources, particularly in relation to manganese, which is the backbone of our national-defense program, could be developed to such an extent that within a period of some 4 or 5 years we would probably be independent of foreign sources for supplies.

The committee has authorized the appropriation of $100,000,000 for this purpose but has not allocated any portion of the authorization to any particular year, but has provided that it is subject to use by the War Department as in the judgment of the officials in control of acquisition as to the extent to which they shall go in the acquisition of foreign stocks, or encouragement of development and production of domestic stocks. The committee feeling that under existing world conditions it might be necessary to spend the whole of the money authorized, or such portion as may be appropriated by the Appropriations Committee, in 1 year, while any change of conditions might justify its being spent over a period of 4 years at the rate of about $25,000,000 per year.

This matter, the committee felt, should be left to the sound judgment of the Ordnance Branch of the War Department, under the supervision of the Secretary of War, and the Procurement Division concerned with procuring these stock piles.

Two methods of solving this problem have been suggested to your committee: First, the purchase of stock piles of strategic minerals to be held in reserve for military and civilian use in an emergency; and, second, the stimulation of domestic industries by tariff protection or other subsidies.

It is the opinion of your committee that if the acquisition of stock piles is established as a national policy, certain advance precautions should be taken in the public interest. Material purchased for storage must be of standard grade, such as industry is accustomed to using, as we should no more expect our industries to function in time of war with off-grade raw materials than we would expect the Army and Navy to fight with defective equipment.

The bill also provides for the acquiring of stocks of strategic and critical materials for the national defense from nations which are indebted to the United States and which will consent to credit the agreed purchase price on the principal of such indebtedness; also to undertake the acquisition of these materials from those nations who will consent to exchange surplus agricultural commodities owned by the Federal Government. Stocks so acquired to constitute a national reserve and to be used only during an emergency upon order of the President in time of war or when he shall find that a national emergency exists with respect to national defense as a consequence of the threat of war.

It was developed by testimony given before this committee by the various departments that the United States, while self-supporting with regard to national resources, to a greater extent than any other nation, is lacking certain raw materials essential to the need of the armed forces of the Nation and to the well-being of the civilian population in event of war.

The important strategic raw materials, manganese, chromium, tungsten, and tin, are either entirely lacking in this country or are produced in very limited quantities incapable of marked expansion and supplies must be imported over long ocean routes.

The United States would find itself at a grave disadvantage in the event that war or other emergency should close the sea lanes or block the normal sources of supply.

To assure that our military forces be adequately supplied with munitions, and that the civilian element suffer no unnecessary hardship in event of war, it is advisable that stocks of these strategic materials be sufficient, when supplemented by domestic production and supplies carried in the hands of dealers and manufacturers, to last the Nation through at least 2 years of national emergency, be procured in time of peace or reasonable international tranquillity and released upon emergency upon order of the Secretary of War.

It is advisable that this legislation be enacted at this time since it is evident that its provisions can be carried out only in time of peace. Furthermore, the provisions of the Neutrality Act add urgency to this legislation since, even during a major war to which this Nation were not a party, the application of the embargoes provided in the Neutrality Act might result in retaliatory action on the part of the nations involved with resulting hardship and diplomatic friction to the United States.

Discussion of the four strategic materials follows:

MANGANESE ORE

The principal use of manganese is in the manufacture of steel. It is impossible to produce sound steel without high-grade manganese ore. Other uses are in dry batteries, in paint and varnish, and in fertilizer.

The principal sources are Russia, Africa, Brazil, and India.

Small quantities of ferro-grade ore are produced in this country and in Cuba.

Stock pile recommended, 554,000 long tons.

CHROME ORE

Principal use of chromium is in the manufacture of high-grade alloy and corrosion-resisting steels. Other uses are in refractories, brick and cement, and in the chemical industry for electroplating, dyeing, and tanning.

Sources are South Africa, Turkey, India, and New Caledonia.

Domestic stocks are limited and production has averaged only 500 tons per year.

Domestic production in war is estimated at not more than 25 percent of requirements.

Stock pile recommended, 250,000 long tons.

TUNGSTEN ORE

Tungsten is used principally in the steel industry in producing high-speed tool steel. The mass production required in war makes tool steel for high-speed machining of metals vital.

Sources are China, Burma, and Bolivia.

Domestic production in war can be increased to supply approximately 25 percent of requirements.

Stock pile recommended, 3,350 short tons.

TIN

Principal use is in tinplate for food containers. It is also used in bearings, for solder, and in the making of bronze and tinfoil.

Sources are in the Straits Settlements of Malaya, the United Kingdom, and Bolivia.

There is no domestic production of tin, although approximately 30 percent of requirements may be obtained from secondary sources, including detinning.

Stock pile recommended, 85,000 short tons.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Does not the story the gentleman has so dramatically told emphasize the fact that in creating stock piles of strategic minerals we should not lose sight of the abundant manganese deposits in the United States and particularly in Utah, Colorado, and other intermountain States, also to some extent here in the East? We should not overlook the importance of developing this source of manganese so that we shall not be dependent on foreign countries for it during a state of war. By developing our local deposits we can depend on American manganese rather than foreign manganese.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. A very important feature of this bill provides for the development of domestic manganese.

Mr. O'CONNOR rose.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. May I suggest to the gentleman that he make his inquiries of members of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I want to supplement by an observation the statement made by the gentleman from Utah, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Supplementing what the gentleman from Utah said, may I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that Montana alone is capable of producing 70,000 tons of manganese annually and has shipped 16,844 long tons, or two-thirds of the entire amount shipped from the United States during the year 1937. We have great bodies of manganese and chromite in the State of Montana that have not been developed. That is one reason why I am very strong for this bill, with some suggestions to be made later on as to amendment.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. As I said a moment ago, this bill provides for the investigation and development of those resources.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims may have permission to sit during the session of the House on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I presume this is agreeable to the minority members of that committee?

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. I have not consulted them, but this meeting is for the purpose of considering an omnibus bill. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. THOMAS], minority member of the committee, I am sure, will be agreeable.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY]?

There was no objection.

ACQUISITION OF STOCKS OF STRATEGIC AND CRITICAL MATERIALS

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, in discussing the bill before us (H. R. 5191), a proposal to vote $100,000,000 or more of Federal funds for the purchase of so-called strategic or critical materials, I wish to state I hope that the provisions specified in section 7 will be carried out in a sound and beneficial manner. Especially do I hope that a great proportion of this appropriation will be used for the purchase of American-made goods, American-mined ores, and every other profitable product of the soil and of the toil of our American citizenship.

I am not a blind or a partisan critic of this administration, nor am I criticizing the motives underlying the philosophy behind this measure to purchase so-called strategic materials. I realize full well that we have an inadequate supply of certain critical minerals and other materials, such as tin, rubber, nickel, manganese, and chromium in this country. I am fully aware that when chromium and other alloys are added to our American-made steel and American-made copper they make harder, tougher metals, more suitable for the many purposes of armaments and other war uses. For instance, gun barrels, cannons, steel helmets would be ineffective without chromium. It is undoubtedly important that we have ample supplies of these materials to properly safeguard ourselves in the event of an attack on our own shores.

Mindful as I am that we have now embarked on a campaign of spending hundreds of millions of dollars on war machinery, I am not unmindful that millions of our people are fearful that we are going to become embroiled in a European war. Why, I ask, this dreadful specter of war? Do you not, Mr. Speaker, yourself, believe that much of the war hysteria of the people of the United States is due to the attitude of many here in Washington? Do you not believe that this bill which provides for the piling up of war supplies will but further agitate our own, as well as foreign nationals?

I, for one, believe not alone that we should but that we can remain out of foreign wars if henceforth we but mind our own business, and millions of our citizens are of the same mind.

For hundreds of years European conflicts have been raged over certain boundary lines. I now repeat what I have stated many times: What difference does it make to our citizenship along what river or chain of mountains the boundaries of the states of Europe, Asia, or Africa are laid? "What matter to us what flag flies over Djibouti or Tunisia?" "What difference to us, whether foreign countries be ruled by so-called 'czars,' or 'kaiser,' or 'kings,' or whether they be designated 'commissars,' or 'fuerhers,' or 'duces.'" All rule with an iron hand. The type of government which the people of foreign countries want is for them, not for us, to decide. "What difference to us, whether any European country have 600 or 800,000 soldiers when we have our own standing army of unemployed amounting to approximately 12,000,000?" Each time legislation comes before us, we should ask ourselves: Will it help the farmer? Will it put Americans back to work in our mines, on our railroads, in our factories? So I ask today, what does this bill do for our own people? What can those who will administer it do best to assure benefits to our own citizenry? Those are the questions which constitute the real kernel of this and all discussion.

In my opinion, such foreign purchases are but a temporary solution. Are we to be called upon forever to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on foreign-made goods for war purposes? You will readily admit that such a procedure would not make us self-sufficient or permanently solve our problem. There is only one way to do that, and that is to develop, as far as possible, our own industries in America for producing these materials. Are we under this bill, Mr. Speaker, to buy millions of dollars worth of manganese from foreign countries when the records of the United States Government Survey shows natural deposits in excess of 100,000,000 tons of manganese ore in South Dakota alone, to say nothing of the actual production over the years of manganese in Arizona, Montana, Nevada, and Virginia? It is a historic fact that the State of Virginia, during the War between the States, produced 18,000 tons of manganese, and a further fact that since that time that great Commonwealth has produced in excess of 1,440,000 tons for the American steel industry. It is also a fact, Mr. Speaker, that prior to the World War American industry was entirely dependent upon Germany for her chemicals and dyes. In the United States today we produce our own picric acids, our own nitrogens, and our own dyes. Such also was the history of the portland-cement industry, all of which came from England until the Republican tariffs imposed in the McKinley administration gave birth to the development of that industry in America. Otherwise we would be voting money today to buy foreign cement as a strategic material. So I say to you today: Let us develop our own industries. It can be done. It should be done. Let this Congress give our own people work. It is their heritage, not ours to deny it to them.

Let me refer you to the testimony of my colleague the Honorable J. F. SCRUGHAM, Democratic Representative to Congress from the State of Nevada, and quote from testimony taken at the hearing before the Military Affairs Committee February 28, 1929, on this bill:

Mr. FADDIS. Do you think it is important for us to obtain a foreign supply of these strategic materials or to develop home industry?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I think it is far more important for us to develop home industry.

Mr. FADDIS. How long do you think it will take to develop home industry?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. That is a matter of spending dollars and cents. All of the materials, even tin, exist in this country, and particularly there are occurrences of nickel in several places which have not been explored.

Mr. FADDIS. But particularly with reference to the supply of manganese, what do you think?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. In my opinion, there is an ample supply in this country, but it requires tariff protection or wartime conditions for commercial production.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, that the distinguished gentleman from Nevada who admits that it requires the application of the Republican principles of tariff protection to develop this for our domestic infant industries is himself a Democrat.

The public press informs us that the German motor lories, motortrucks, and other mobiles, mechanized artillery now roll down the highways of the German Reich on ersatz. In this instance ersatz is a rubber substitute, a synthetic rubber product made of bituminous coal and lime, vast deposits of which natural resource exist not alone in the great State of Illinois but elsewhere throughout the country.

Among the best signal wires and cables made use of by the Signal Corps in the World War were those insulated with synthetic rubber made of American-produced sulfur, talcum, and vegetable oils, produced by American miners, quarrymen, and farmers. Almost daily in Congress we hear of the superiority of the German air forces over our American air forces. This is said to be due to the lack of proper research studies necessary to the construction of the American aircraft.

I am going to submit to this Congress the proposition of submitting to all suitable departments of our Government such as the War, the Navy, the Department of Agriculture, and of Commerce, a proposal to proceed immediately to a factual determination that would sound out in truth the real or fancied shortage now existent in so-called strategic materials.

Further, that this Congress should ascertain from the Federal Tariff Commission the cost of production of manganese abroad as well as in the United States and of any and all other materials purchased under this act. I further propose that they report these findings back to this Congress so that proper steps may be taken that would insure for all time our economic self-sufficiency in any critical material of which there is an insufficiency for all purposes both in peace and in national defense.

Mr. Speaker, I am not interested in the least in building up the agriculture, the forest, or the mining interests of other countries. I am interested in maintaining the tonnage necessary to the support of the transcontinental railroad systems which converge on the shores of Lake Michigan at Chicago. Are we to see these foreign materials piled up on the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard hauled and transported in foreign ships while our trains and train crews lie idle?

More particularly, Mr. Speaker, I am tremendously interested in reducing unemployment in the mines, in the fields, as well as in the forests of the United States, and I am even still more profoundly interested in building up and not depleting the incomes of American workers throughout the United States.

If there ever was a time when we needed to explore, discover, and develop our own American national resources, certainly today is the time, faced, as we are, with top-heavy unemployment in every basic American industry. Let us no longer be romanticists and idealists in the discussion of this measure. Let us in no uncertain terms make it clear that the preponderance of these moneys be used for the benefit of our own farmers, our own miners, our own railroaders. Let us clearly understand that we will develop so far as possible these strategic materials in this country, for only then will we be self-sufficient.

I was deeply impressed, Mr. Speaker, by a news article carried on the front page of one of our great Chicago dailies under date of Friday April 21. The fundamental economic and factual soundness underlying that article commended it to me. The brilliant editorial expression and policies that characterize the editorial staff of that paper commends that article to every Member on both sides of the aisle and in Congress, and particularly so, in debate on this bill.

Let me now quote from that article, the headline of which read: "One hundred Kane County farmers attend third S. O. S. feast."

For 50 cents each, here's what more than 100 farmers feasted upon at Geneva Hall last night.

Thick pork steaks, creamed potatoes, custard pie—

And mark me, Mr. Speaker, an Illinois farm custard pie is made with rich Illinois eggs and milk; and when I say eggs I do not mean imported dried or frozen Chinese eggs—

* * *, and pies were topped with a fluffy meringue made of American egg whites * * *, American, not Chinese, dried egg albumen, together with plenty of milk, with lots of cream content. Tasty American cheese, hot rolls, and butter.

This dinner—

Continues the article—

was one of a series of farmers' "S. O. S. dinners," "Serve Only Surplus," started by Kane County, Ill., farmers. The idea underlying the plan was to use up farm surpluses and to raise farm prices. The first dinner was attended by only 7 farmers and the second by 40.

Mr. A. H. Kirkland, temporary secretary of the S. O. S., hopes the surplus-foods-dinner idea will spread in chain form throughout the country. Each guest at a dinner is expected to invite six guests to the next one. At that rate, Mr. Kirkland says, more than 4,000,000 persons will be partaking of dinners of surplus foods throughout the Nation in a short time.

Mr. Speaker, the Kane County and the Illinois farmers, Mr. A. H. Kirkland, their secretary, and the Chicago Daily Tribune are to be congratulated upon their formulating, sponsoring, support, and publicizing of such a program and their pursuing of such a policy. If there is a real shortage of any necessary or strategic material or suitable substitute in our country, materials not native to our own mineral forests or agricultural resources, why cannot our farmers and our miners through the ordinary and the long-established channels of commerce, by and with the aid of the assistance of this Federal Government, mutually exchange these goods in a program of true reciprocity?

Webster defines "reciprocity" as being, "An equality of mutual benefits * * * to be yielded or enjoyed."

Reciprocity in that sense does not, as under the present policy of the Roosevelt administration and the Hull trade program, imply increasing the importation of canned meats, beef, hogs, cattle, hams, bacon, shoulders, cheese, and corn into this country. It does not mean increased importation by the hundreds of millions of pounds of butter and lard substitutes while our own hog lard is a dreg on the market. Nor, Mr. Speaker, does it mean the importation of foreign products by the billions of pounds of corn-starch substitutes, with our own cribs full to overflowing.

The reciprocity program of trade as originally projected by the Republican Party did not and does not now imply a reduction in the tariff schedules on steel products such as were made under the Hull British colonial trade agreements, while the blast furnaces in the East Chicago steel district stood cold and idle and the workers in the Calumet district without gainful employment.

Certainly reciprocity in its true sense does not mean, as the records of the United States Department of Commerce so vividly disclose:

The tremendously increasing imports by the hundreds of thousands of tons of coal, coke, and briquettes from Great Britain, French Indochina, or from the United States to Soviet Russia.

Millions of tons of coal and coal products have been imported into the United States under the Roosevelt-Hull trade agreement program, while in the ghost villages and abandoned coal towns of Illinois our own Illinois miners are compelled to seek their sustenance on W. P. A. work projects; there to be ballyhooed and advertised under red, white, and blue banners as the recipients of Federal relief.

In discussing a problem similar to this very one which confronted our country in 1864, President Abraham Lincoln declared:

If America buys a ton of steel rails in England, America gets the steel rails, but England gets the $90.

If, however—

America buys that ton of steel rails in the United States, America gets the steel rails and America has the $90.

There is, Mr. Speaker, a world of wisdom, sagacity, and plain common sense wrapped up in that little human story, told by that distinguished Republican President, which is wholly applicable to the problems confronting this House in its deliberation on this bill, H. R. 5191.

Let us defend American labor, industry, and agriculture in times of peace, and American farmers and industrial workers will defend our shores in times of war. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would like to ask a question with reference to the provisions contained on page 3 of the bill, lines 1 to 3, where the following language appears:

To make purchases of such materials in accordance with specifications prepared by the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department and approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and to provide for the storage and maintenance, and, where necessary to prevent deterioration, for the rotation of such materials.

I would like to refer further to page 4, lines 9 to 13, to this effect:

The duties on these materials imported shall not be covered into the general fund of the Treasury, but shall be held and, as I understand, added to this $100,000,000 in the form of a revolving fund.

Two questions are involved here. How will the Treasury Department dispose of these goods which are necessary to be rotated in order to prevent deterioration? Is it the plan of this bill to transfer them from one warehouse to another and thus prevent deterioration, or does this bill give authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to take these goods and put them on the market and dispose of them in order to prevent deterioration? Can the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I appreciate the questions of the able gentleman from Michigan. I am honored by his asking me these questions, because I know that no Member of Congress has a better understanding of or a greater desire to understand the various measures under consideration than the gentleman from Michigan. However I wish the gentleman would propound that question to a member of the Committee on Military Affairs who has attended the hearings on this bill.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman is making a very interesting speech. I wish to call attention to the essential harmony of two points he has made. First, the gentleman states that the American people want to keep out of foreign trouble. Second, the gentleman points to the importance of developing domestic industry. I would simply nail a point right in there, that the development of a domestic industry is the surest way for us to keep out of foreign trouble, because we need manganese in time of peace as well as in time of war. If we develop our domestic deposits, we can have the manganese we need for industry and will not be trying to bring it in over war-ridden seas.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I thank the gentleman for his appropriate and convincing statement. He always contributes to a better understanding of the matters before us.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman will recall that a huge manganese plant that was built in the State of Arizona at tremendous cost was forced to close shortly after this administration negotiated its reciprocal-trade treaty with Brazil, from which we are now importing manganese.

I regret that under this program of purchasing we are not to buy more lead and zinc. Of course, we all know this country produces a sufficient supply of lead and zinc, but I wish to remind the gentleman that under the recent reciprocal trade agreement made with Canada many of our lead and zinc mines in this country, not only in my district but in the great tri-State area of Oklahoma, Kansas, and Missouri, have been forced to close, thus throwing many miners out of employment due to the importation of zinc produced by cheap labor abroad.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit me to add the observation that at the time this Arizona mine closed a company which had spent over $400,000 in preparing to set up a plant on the South Dakota deposits was forced to abandon its work?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I should like to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD]. I call the attention of the gentleman to the provisions of section 3 of the bill on the question of preventing deterioration and decay of the materials. A system of rotation is provided for in that section of the bill. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may replace acquired stocks of any materials subject to deterioration by equivalent quantities of the same material by such methods as they may determine serves best the purposes of the act.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, that is the very point I desire to clear up, because what I want to know is whether the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the Secretary of War, can proceed to dispose of these commodities on the open market in competition with the inventory holdings of those engaged in private industry.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I can yield any further at this time because of the demand for time. Perhaps that matter can be determined when we are considering the bill proper.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished chairman of our Rules Committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, first let me congratulate my colleague the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. LEWIS] for so ably explaining the rule and the bill that is made in order under the rule. I hope we will have the gentleman here in the future to present many more of these bills. At the same time, I want to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] for his excellent work in drafting so fine a bill and for his interest generally in behalf of the people and their welfare. I listened to him with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction when he recently appeared before the Rules Committee, and I may say to the House that there are very few men possessing his intelligence and the knowledge he has on this subject. I congratulate him upon his success in the matter. [Applause.]

I do not want to speak on the rule or the bill. I leave that in the capable charge of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. MAY] and the other members of that committee. I desire only to make a few observations at this time in reply to my colleague from Illinois, the genial Mr. ALLEN, who serves with me on the Rules Committee.

Mr. Speaker, the President submitted a fine report to the House this morning on reorganization, in which he states the Nation will be saved at least $20,000,000. Reliable information I have is to the effect it will save closer to $35,000,000 annually.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I regret that I cannot yield now.

Mr. Speaker, in 1933, when I was privileged to serve as chairman of the steering committee, the great majority of new Democrat Members in the House made it difficult for them to take up individually with the President numerous matters and complaints with regard to the various departments. After a study of conditions, the steering committee proposed to the President that four or six appointees be designated as secretaries and that there evolve upon them the duty of acting as intermediaries and assistants with whom congressional problems could be taken up. It is therefore especially pleasing to me that the President saw fit to adopt our suggestions, and I am naturally glad to know that this will result not only in increased efficiency and better coordination but also in economy, as he states in his message. I feel that this bill will receive the endorsement and support even of those who so strongly opposed the reorganization bill as a whole.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen always complain that we are spending too much money, particularly the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]. Right here let me say that while I am not opposed to the rule, I want this bill to be considered, but I do want the country to understand that the President has not asked for nor recommended $100,000,000. He feels that $10,000,000 each year for 3 or 4 years would suffice, but the committee, which is independent of the President, feels they should recommend $100,000,000. This is just another proof, incidentally, that the President is trying to hold down expenditures, but that the House is acting independently, and not as a rubber stamp, as has been so often charged. Still, it is only an authorization, and not an appropriation, and I hope that the Appropriations Committee will not appropriate more than the President suggested unless there are very good reasons for so doing. I also agree with my colleague from Illinois in saying that every dollar should be spent in this country, provided that we can obtain here the materials we need.

Mr. Speaker, as to war, I can assure my colleague from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] that it is not the President who is trying to involve this country in war. The President is doing everything humanly possible to keep us out of war, and some day in the near future every Member of this House and every honest American will recognize this fact and give him credit for his efforts. [Applause.]

I say it is most unfair for Republicans to jump at every chance they have to charge that he is trying to involve us in war, when by every step possible he seeks to prevent a war and to bring peace and happiness not only to the people of America, but to the people of the world. [Applause.]

My friends on the Republican side have tried to inject the tariff issue into this question. Perhaps my colleague from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN], who is chairman of the Republican Congressional Political Committee, can tell us what tariff law we had from 1929 up to 1933. Was it not the Republican Smoot-Hawley tariff which brought about such prosperity under Hoover from 1929 to 1933? I think my good friend would be wise not to inject the tariff question into this discussion, because it does not reflect too well upon his own party. However, just for his information, I would like to call his attention to a very excellent and clear article appearing in the New York Times under date of Sunday, April 16, 1939, Trade Pacts Prove Superior to Barter. It shows our gains by means of trade treaties have increased in the past few years by 39.8 percent, while Germany's gains total 1.8 percent for the same period.

As I have said, all I desire is to answer a few of these points my colleague has raised during his remarks. I am hopeful that when the bill is considered on the floor ample opportunity will be given to explain to the House why an authorization for the expenditure of $100,000,000 is necessary at this time. I know that those in control of our military affairs can spend $100,000,000. They can spend $500,000,000 or even $1,000,000,000, because they are adept at spending. And my experience is that they reach their zenith during the months of April, May, and June each year. Their hardest effort is to see how they can spend the money they inveigled Congress into appropriating each year. Just in passing, I want to say that I am not entirely satisfied with the way the War Department proceeds in purchasing supplies and materials. I do not blame Admiral Peoples, but I do think that some of his subordinates should be checked upon, and on those matters I am going to insist upon a report. Only a few days ago information came to me of certain firms being favored, and many reports are to the effect that profits in airplanes and motors are outrageously high. If necessary, I shall bring a resolution before this House to investigate these matters.

I think we should begin to scrutinize the appropriations and expenditures to these departments and to bring about the economy the President seeks and on which the Democratic Party insists. Let us show the country that we not only preach economy but practice it.

Mr. Speaker, I recall the days of 1917 and 1918. I know that we authorized the expenditure of money to produce in America some of these raw materials, and I know what failure to be prepared means. I also remember claims against the Government by some of the mining engineers and experts who were authorized to develop some of these materials and the promises they never fulfilled. Even now we have claims pending before the Committee on Claims amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, because it is claimed that the Government and military establishments authorized these people to undertake developments for which they now claim never to have been compensated. Therefore, I feel that we should be careful under this bill before new ventures are authorized, and I hope that those who have charge of the matter will be satisfied first that there are no gentlemen who will try to experiment at the expense of our country, but to whomever is given the work should first be found to be reliable and dependable, someone who can be trusted to produce the needed articles in our country. I am for the reemployment of American labor first, and any mineral that can be produced and manufactured should be made here. As I understand, Mr. FADDIS, that is the aim, that every effort will be made to produce and finally to manufacture everything and anything that can be produced in this country. Is that not right?

Mr. FADDIS. That is correct.

Mr. SABATH. That would increase employment and bring about better conditions generally.

I think I have said just about all I wanted to talk to you about, and so I will conclude right here. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, sometimes I get a little confused in this House over the difference between millions and billions. I understood the chairman of the Rules Committee to state that the reorganization might save $20,000,000. I assume that he has forgotten about the expenditure of the other $10,000,000,000.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. And it must be gratifying to the economy-minded Members to find that we may save $20,000,000 through the reorganization bill and spend $10,000,000,000 in some other way. That is a very fine way to economize.

Mr. SABATH. I have just been informed that the saving will be at least $35,000,000. The President was not well-informed when he said $20,000,000.

Mr. FISH. And now I understand the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee to state that the President was not well informed. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois completely.

Mr. SABATH. As to the size of the sum that would be saved.

Mr. FISH. This is not the first time that he has been badly informed, and I rather believe that the reorganization will not save a single dollar when we get right down to rock bottom, because the President has never saved anything before this. He has a perfect record in this respect.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. In that respect permit me to say that the President is always careful and he rather underestimates than overestimates matters of that kind.

Mr. FISH. And all I can say to the gentleman is that I judge people by their past records, and as Al Smith often said, "Let us look at the record." For 6 years the President of the United States has come before the Congress annually and told how he proposed to balance the Budget, and each year we have had a deficit of from two to three billion dollars. I rather believe when he gets through with the reorganization that instead of saving $20,000,000, we will have a deficit of $20,000,000, but that is such a small sum under the New Deal that we need not worry about it.

Mr. SHORT. And is it not an undeniable fact each year our revenues have fallen pitifully below anticipation and our expenses have far exceeded their estimates.

Mr. FISH. By $2,000,000,000 or more a year.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FISH. Oh, I would love to.

Mr. BOLAND. Do I understand that the idea of the gentleman from New York is that the President should balance the Budget at the expense of starving people in the Nation?

Mr. FISH. No. I have generally voted myself for the one-third that are undernourished, underfed, and underclothed under this administration, because it does not do anything to solve the problem, and we are forced to do something ourselves in Congress to try to feed them.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri first.

Mr. BOLAND. Just 1 moment.

Mr. FISH. I shall come back to the gentleman in a moment. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. The fact is that no single individual in this country ever starved, and all this relief and all this pump-priming has done has been to perpetuate the poverty of the people while piling up a debt of billions.

Mr. FISH. That ought to be a complete answer.

Mr. BOLAND. The gentleman agreed to yield to me.

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. BOLAND. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there were no starving people before Mr. Roosevelt came into office?

Mr. SHORT. No more than we have today.

Mr. BOLAND. Does the gentleman know there were bread lines in every large industrial center of this country?

Mr. SHORT. My God, we have got Government soup kitchens now everywhere.

Mr. BOLAND. There were 20,000,000 people in the bread lines.

Mr. SHORT. These new dealers are not philanthropists and they are not interested in feeding the hungry and clothing the naked as much as they are in turning it into a political racket to perpetuate themselves in power. You will find that out next year, as you did last.

Mr. FISH. Go right ahead. I like that kind of talk.

Mr. BOLAND. The gentleman is not so sure of that. I do not think the gentleman is that much of a prophet as to say that we will find that out next year. Next year you will find out something.

Mr. FISH. Now, what were we discussing a few moments ago? [Laughter.] I just want to find out what this bill is we were discussing and get back to it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield, certainly.

Mr. KNUTSON. Next year we will be wondering what we are going to do with the mess you folks left us. [Laughter.]

Mr. FISH. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have before us a little bill. It involves only $100,000,000—a paltry sum under the New Deal and in these days of war hysteria and fear and dread of war. I am not opposing the bill. I would like to reduce the amount in the bill because I believe it is excessive. When you consider a bill of this kind for acquiring stocks of strategic and critical war materials you almost think you are in the midst of war. You can almost hear the beating of the wings of the angel of death as she hovers over America. You are apt to believe we are about to let loose the dogs of war.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield, certainly.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I recall with very great satisfaction a very splendid speech made by the gentleman from New York 4 or 5 years ago, urging investigation looking toward the ultimate acquisition of such strategic materials as, for example, tin. Certainly at that time there was no talk of war. The gentleman stimulated at that time the interest which I already had in this matter.

Mr. FISH. I am glad I converted the gentleman at that time and I am glad he is helping bring in this bill, because I am for the general principles of the legislation. I am going to give my reasons why I do not believe it should carry $100,000,000 or $50,000,000 or $40,000,000, and possibly not more than $10,000,000. I believe in acquiring this tin. I believe in acquiring rubber and the other necessary materials that we do not have; but I was wondering whether the gentleman from Colorado in the Southwest has ever heard about the war debts and whether he knows that those nations which own and have a monopoly on tin and rubber still owe us between four and five billion dollars.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I am well aware of that fact. Indeed, the bill provides for an effort, at least, to secure these materials in part from the nations of the world that owe us, and in exchange to give them credit on their war debts.

Mr. FISH. I was just wondering why it was necessary to spend $100,000,000 to acquire rubber and tin from Great Britain when Great Britain owes us between four and five billion dollars, and why it could not be arranged to get a partial payment every year in rubber and tin, and if you want to throw in tea and other commodities that we do not produce, I would not oppose that either.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I thoroughly approve of that plan. Indeed, it is provided for in the bill.

Mr. FISH. Yes. There was a little clause that was inserted here that even some members of the committee did not know existed. I want to bring out that I do not think it is necessary to carry this large appropriation. I want to discuss briefly the war-debt situation, and then you can ask all the questions you want.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. This is not an appropriation, I may say. This is an authorization bill.

Mr. FISH. Of course it is an authorization, but it will be a mandate of the Congress and expected to be followed later on by an appropriation.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BARRY. The gentleman's theory, as far as our foreign policy is concerned, is that we mind our own business. If war broke out in Europe and Asia, we have enough foodstuffs to be self-sufficient, except for tea, cocoa, and such things, but we do not have enough critical war materials. If we acquire a sufficient amount of them to last for 5 years, could we not follow out the gentleman's theory of isolation and not even say "Hello" to Europe and Asia, and go along with an internal economy of our own?

Mr. FISH. I see the logic of the gentleman's statement; but as long as he raises that issue, I would say that I cannot conceive of any war that will cut off these raw materials mentioned in this bill, particularly tin or rubber, because we can get tin from Bolivia. I cannot conceive of any war that would interfere with our trade with Bolivia. As a matter of fact, spending these billions—not millions, but billions—of dollars to build a navy, it seems to me that we could get any of these raw materials from Holland or the Malay Peninsula, whether it is rubber or any other necessary raw material, as long as we have the largest navy we have ever had. I do not assume that this huge navy is to be sterilized like our gold in Kentucky and to be of no more use than the gold is.

I do not see, since we are spending billions of dollars to have a Navy, why we should not be able to secure these materials even in wartime, because no nation intends to attack us, and will not attack us as long as we have a powerful Navy. I am sure the gentleman agrees with this.

Mr. BARRY. It would be much safer, I am sure, if we did not have to go abroad to get anything. A recent survey showed that there are something like eight critical raw materials that we lack; and whether we have to go down to Bolivia or out to the Malay Peninsula, will not the gentleman admit that it would be much safer for the peace of this country and in keeping with his theories of isolation if we did not have to trade with anyone unless we wanted to?

Mr. FISH. My principles of isolation certainly do not go that far. I am in favor of trading with these nations. I am opposed to the cash-and-carry plan in the neutrality bill, and was opposed to it when the last bill came up. I would like to see it done away with. I believe it is an intolerable limitation and restraint upon our ships, that we cannot carry any goods to belligerent nations, but must let all the other ships of the world do so. I want our ships to trade out in the Far East, to buy rubber, tin, or anything else we need but to trade with belligerents at their own risk.

I am perfectly willing to go along with this war-scare bill to be on the safe side, as the gentleman says. I do not see that there is any necessity for it, for I believe we can go anywhere and get anything we want whether in time of peace or in time of war; but to be on the safe side and to make assurance doubly sure I will support the bill in principle. When it comes to spending any money, I think it is preposterous to buy rubber and tin, both of which come from the British Empire, as she has a monopoly on both, without calling upon her to make partial payment of their war debts in tin and rubber. Certainly the gentleman does not object to that.

Mr. BARRY. I am in favor of that. If, however, the gentleman agrees with the principle of the bill, that we acquire critical war materials, certainly he is not going to object to the $100,000,000 or take the position that $100,000,000 is too much to provide these materials sufficient to last us for any reasonable length of time.

Mr. FISH. The reason I am opposed to spending the $100,000,000 is simply because if we put the authorization for the $100,000,000 in the bill, leaving it as it is now, the Navy Department, the War Department, or those who buy the strategic and critical war materials will forget the fact that Great Britain still owes us four or five billions of dollars. If we authorize an expenditure of $10,000,000 each year, then the Navy Department, the War Department, or whatever the department may be that will procure these war materials, will think most earnestly about these debts that are due us and join in making demands for rubber and tin from Great Britain to be offset against her war debts.

I remember back in 1931 and 1932 when then President Herbert Hoover communicated with President-elect Franklin Delano Roosevelt asking him to cooperate to settle the war debts. Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, then Governor of New York State, wrote to President Hoover and said: "No. I propose to do that in my own way. That will be the first objective of my administration."

Under the Republican administration we received payment of about $200,000,000 annually, but under this administration we have not received any money at all from these debtor nations, except from little, honest Finland. I ask why this is not the time to get something out of them in the way of partial payments through supplying rubber, tin, and other essential raw materials for war purposes that we do not produce in this country? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how the time stands?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado has 8 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Illinois has used all his time.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7½ minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], the author of this bill.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the very distinguished member of the Committee on Rules [Mr. LEWIS] for his exceptionally able presentation of the rule on this bill. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I be not interrupted until I have finished making my statement, because many and varied conflicting questions have already been injected into this debate, and it is my desire to present the essential features of this legislation in a clear and connected manner.

To begin with I want everyone to realize and to take into consideration the fact that this bill is a measure designed, first, to provide for our national security. This is the foremost thought in connection with the legislation, and has been ever since it has been under consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs. From the very first bill I introduced on this subject about 4 years ago—and as far as I know that was the first bill ever introduced upon this subject—every bill has contained the provision that this material should be acquired by exchange or credit on the war debts, or by exchange of surplus agricultural commodities. So this feature is not new by any manner of means.

I want it also distinctly understood, as the gentleman from Colorado attempted to make plain, that this bill is not the outgrowth of any war hysteria. It is the outgrowth of many years of work on the part of officers connected with the Army and the Navy—or, to be more explicit, the Assistant Secretary of War of the United States—to provide a program that would make this Nation self-sufficient to meet the needs of an emergency.

Anyone who attended the hearings on this bill and listened to the discussions in the committee would gain the idea that this is a bill for the acquisition of manganese alone, because the American Manganese Producers' Association appeared at these hearings and, with all of the power of a very unscrupulous lobby, attempted to prostitute the interests of national defense to the domestic production of manganese in the United States. All the way through the committee fought that attempt, and when the bill was written it was written without giving in to the demands of the American Manganese Producers' Association.

I know the pressure that has been exerted upon Members of the Congress who represent districts containing deposits of manganese. I know where this pressure has come from. It is not the first time, by any means, that this pressure has been exerted upon Members of Congress.

On last Wednesday, April 19, I inserted a letter from the president of the American Manganese Producers' Association, page 1542 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I answered this letter paragraph by paragraph. I would ask that each and every Member of the House secure the RECORD and read that letter before making up his mind with reference to certain amendments which may be introduced to this piece of legislation.

Do not take the judgment of those who are endeavoring to inject amendments into this legislation in order to make it a bonanza for unscrupulous promoters of mining enterprises throughout the United States. Take the judgment of the members of the committee; take the judgment of the members of the Army, the Navy, the State Department, the Geological Survey, the Bureau of Mines, and other bureaus connected with this Government who appeared in support of the present legislation in its present form.

If you will read the hearings held last year by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs you will find that not one single official connected with the Government, not one single man who is charged with the duty of procuring these materials, appeared before that committee who did not discount the possibility of making this Nation self-sufficient in regard to manganese or any other of these essential commodities through domestic production. If you will read the record of the committee hearings held by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House you will find that each and every official of this Government who appeared before the committee made the statement that from past experience they did not believe it was possible to procure enough manganese from domestic sources to make this country self-sufficient in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, no one is attempting to discourage domestic production. We, however, do not wish to see the acquisition of the materials under the terms of this legislation delayed in order to encourage these would-be promoters of domestic manganese mining ventures to the end that we shall have no manganese.

I wish to go back into the history of the World War. Under the high pressure of wartime prices were five times normal. At that time the American producers of manganese were able to produce only 35 percent of the manganese consumed at that time. As the chairman of the Committee on Rules stated, we are still engaged in litigation trying to settle some of the claims which resulted from the overextravagant promises of the promoters of that day in getting some of the people of this Nation entangled into enterprises to produce manganese.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. As I recall, the Geological Survey reported that there are about 100,000,000 tons of manganese in this country and that manganese is found in 38 States of the Union.

Mr. FADDIS. One hundred million tons of manganese ore. No doubt. But that is manganese ore of a varying content of manganese and of a varying analysis. When we speak of the manganese that we use, we refer to manganese ore with a content of 40 to 60 percent pure manganese and free from undesirable foreign contents.

Mr. KNUTSON. I concede that the American ore is not as high grade as some of the other ore, but I think it compares favorably with Russian manganese.

Mr. FADDIS. To answer the gentleman's question, I believe every one realizes the fact that there is a certain amount of manganese ore in the United States. One of the reasons for the reluctance of those who are charged with the duty of procuring this manganese is the fact they want this ore to remain here as a reserve. I am certain that the acquisition of these essential commodities can be safely left in the hands of those officers of the Army and Navy charged with this duty. They have a splendid record for honesty and efficiency built up through a century and a half of brilliant, patriotic, and unselfish service. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, this is a pretty important matter, and I think we should have a quorum, because I am not in favor of this myself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5191) to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for armed forces and the civilian population in time of national emergency, and to encourage the development of these resources within the United States, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5191, with Mr. BOLAND in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, it should first be understood that this bill does not arise out of the present international situation. The Committee on Military Affairs has for several years, certainly during the 3 years I have been a member of that committee, has been studying this identical question. The War Department has been studying the question continuously since the World War and whether you recall it or not, the last Congress in the naval appropriation bill appropriated $3,500,000 for the purchase of strategic war materials. This money is now being expended for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, this bill arises through a realization that our Nation will not be able to carry on a war successfully, or unsuccessfully for that matter, beyond a period of 6 months with the present supply of these materials that we now have on hand.

I consider and I believe the overwhelming majority of the committee consider that the passage of this bill and the acquisition of these materials are just as necessary as the building of battleships. The gentleman from New York a few moments ago said he did not understand why we needed this legislation, because we had such a fine navy. The reason for this legislation is that we not only want a great navy, a strong navy, but we want it employed in time of war in defense and not merely in keeping open the lines of commerce. I am sure that if you will study a map of the world, such as I have here, showing the location of supplies of the different strategic materials, you can easily see that a condition might arise where we would be cut off from the sources of supplies and the only way we could go there and buy the supplies would be with a naval convoy. It is easily possible that a third or a half of our fleet might be engaged in protecting our shipping lines and the ships that would transport these materials and, therefore, the strength and effectiveness of the Navy would be considerably reduced.

At this point I call your attention to a list of the materials which are covered by the pending measure. They are in three groups: First, the strictly strategic materials, of which there are 17 listed by the War Department. The most important of these 17 are chromium, manganese of ferrograde, tin, and tungsten. Second, there are the critical materials, materials which are necessary in time of war and must be stored up. Some of them are available in this country. The list includes 20 such materials. Third, there are the essential materials, and the list includes 35 such materials.

EXHIBIT A

ARMY AND NAVY MUNITIONS BOARD COMMODITIES DIVISION—DEFINITIONS AND LISTS OF ESSENTIAL COMMODITIES

DEFINITIONS

Strategic materials: Strategic materials are those materials essential to the national defense for the supply of which in war dependence must be placed in whole, or in part, on sources outside the continental limits of the United States, and for which strict conservation and distribution control measures will be necessary.

Critical materials: Critical materials are those materials essential to the national defense, the procurement problems of which in war, while difficult, are less serious than those of strategic materials because they can be either domestically produced or obtained in more adequate quantities or have a lesser degree of essentiality, and for which some degree of conservation and distribution control will be necessary.

Essential materials neither strategic nor critical: In this classification are included those materials, essential to the national defense, for which no procurement problems in war are anticipated, but whose status is such as to require constant surveillance because future developments may necessitate reclassification as strategic or critical.

List of strategic materials (17): Aluminum, antimony, chromium, coconut shell char, manganese ferrograde, manila fiber, mica, nickel, optical glass, quartz crystal, quicksilver, quinine, rubber, silk, tin, tungsten, and wool.

List of critical materials (20): Asbestos, cadmium, coffee, cork, cryolite, flaxseed, fluorspar, graphite, hides, iodine, kapok, nux vomica, opium, phenol and picric acid, platinum, scientific glass, tanning materials, titanium, toluol, and vanadium.

Essential materials neither strategic nor critical (35): Arsenic, abrasives, acetic acid, acetone, alcohol (ethyl), camphor, castor oil, chlorine, copper, copra, cotton linters, helium, hemp, jute, iron and steel, lead, magnesium, methanol, molybdenum, nitrogen compounds (ammonia and nitric acid), palm oil, paper and pulp, petroleum, phosphates, potash, refractories, shellac, sisal, sugar, sulfuric acid (including sulfur and pyrites), uranium, webbing and duck, wheat, zinc, and zirconium.

Approved by the Army and Navy Munitions Board, January 7, 1939.

I wish to address my remarks particularly to section 6 of this bill, which provides, in part, as follows:

In the acquisition of stocks of materials, as herein authorized, the agency charged with the duty of acquiring the same shall, as to the materials acquired outside the United States—

(a) Request the appropriate department or departments to undertake the acquisition of the same from those nations which are indebted to the United States and which will consent to credit the agreed purchase price on the principal of such indebtedness.

I call your attention to the fact that numerous nations in the world are indebted to us on loans made during the war and loans made following the armistice, and on November 15 of last year this indebtedness amounted to a little in excess of $13,000,000,000. At this point I insert in the RECORD a statement of the original debts and how they were funded, showing that at the time the debts were funded the foreign debt was in round figures $11,586,000,000.

[1] Payments of governments which have funded were made prior to the date of the funding agreements.
[2] Differences between principal of funded indebtedness and amounts here stated represent deferred payments provided for in the funding agreements, for which bonds of the respective debtor governments have been or will be delivered to the Treasury.
[3] Increase over amount funded due to exercise of options with respect to the payment of interest due on original issue of bonds of debtor governments.
[4] The German Government has been notified that the Government of the United States will look to the German Government for the discharge of this indebtedness of the Government of Austria to the Government of the United States.
[5] Includes additional bonds aggregating $3,489,482.75 received July 23, 1937, in exchange for bonds aggregating $1,207,742 and annuities aggregating $69,534.46, payable on Jan. 1, 1933, 1934, and 1935, but postponed as provided by agreements of May 8, 1930, and Sept. 14, 1932.
[6] The United States holds obligations in the principal amount of $289,898.78, which, together with accrued interest thereon, are to be canceled pursuant to agreement of Apr. 14, 1938, between the United States and the Republic of Nicaragua, ratified by the U. S. Senate on June 13, 1938.
[7] Represents proceeds of liquidation of financial affairs of the Russian Government in this country. (Copies of letter dated May 23, 1922, from the Secretary of State and of reply of the Secretary of the Treasury dated June 2, 1922, in regard to loans to the Russian Government and liquidation of affairs of the latter in this country appear in the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1922, as exhibit 79, p. 283, and in the combined annual reports of the World War Foreign Debt Commission, as exhibit 2, p. 84.)
[8] Includes balances of amounts postponed under provisions of joint resolution of Dec. 23, 1931. (For amounts postponed, see p. 35 of Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1932.)

Fourth. I insert a statement showing the amount of the debt of the German Nation to the United States at this time, which, of course, arose from the expense of our army of occupation and from findings of the Joint Claims Commission.

If you will turn to page 100 of the hearings you will observe that this question was gone into at some length with Dr. Feis, who is the economic adviser of the Department of State. Frankly, neither Dr. Feis nor I have any great hopes that any considerable amount of this material will be secured through giving credits on the debts, but I do say that, in view of the condition of our national debt, which is now over $40,000,000,000, and considering the present tax burden of the American people, when a majority of the nations of the earth owe us in excess of $13,000,000,000, it ill becomes the Congress to seek to appropriate an additional $100,000,000 without at least making an honest effort to try to secure these materials from the nations which will credit the purchase price on their debt. [Applause.]

You will observe the bill states that the purchase price of the materials shall be credited on the principal of the debt. The word "principal" was used advisedly, on the advice of the State Department, whose representatives said there was no hope of getting any nation to send us these materials if credit was given merely on the interest on the war debts; that the nations already owed us so much interest that this amount would be merely a drop in the bucket. They were sure they would not be able to interest any nation in a credit merely on interest. Therefore, the bill provides that if the debtor nations wish to pay their debts we will credit the purchase price of the materials on the principal.

The other provision of section 6, in which I am very deeply interested personally, provides that in the acquisition of stocks of the materials in question the agency charged with the duty of acquiring them shall—

Further request the appropriate department or departments to undertake the acquisition of the same from those nations which consent to exchange such materials for surplus agricultural commodities produced in the United States.

This provision, I submit, is founded upon an old and fundamental principle, that if your cellar is full of apples and you need some potatoes, if you are wise you will take some apples out and exchange them for potatoes.

As every Member of this House knows, this Nation is now burdened with surpluses of wheat and cotton. The most recent report of the Department of Agriculture, which I have before me, indicates that on July 1 the wheat surplus will be approximately 275,000,000 bushels. On March 1, last, the surplus of cotton was approximately 16,750,000 bales, and we are now planting another crop estimated to produce 12,000,000 bales of cotton. On August 1, when we are ready to pick another crop of cotton, counting the cotton on hand and that in the field, we shall have at least 25,000,000 or 26,000,000 bales of American cotton on hand.

This matter was investigated by the committee back in February. Since then you have observed activities on the part of the Senate, and some Senators in particular, and activities on the part of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of State. I am delighted to observe the activities of the Ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. Kennedy, who now gives us some hope that it will be possible to send an enormous amount of cotton to Great Britain in exchange for tin and rubber for war stock purposes.

The Commodity Credit Corporation has loans on more than 11,000,000 bales of cotton, which loans total over $600,000,000.

I submit that it would be unfair to the American people, that it would be unfair to the taxpayers of this Nation for us to undertake to appropriate an additional $100,000,000 out of the United States Treasury without making an honest effort—and I hope and believe a successful effort—to take these enormous surpluses which we now have on hand, to take this enormous surplus of cotton in which our Government now has an investment of over $600,000,000, and use a reasonable amount of it in exchange for the materials which this Nation will so sorely need in time of war.

I hope that this section of the bill may receive the unanimous approval of the Congress. There are some who may say that it is no more than a gesture, but for my part, considering the national debt, considering the burden of taxes, we can at least say of it that it is a magnificent gesture. [Applause.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota and Mr. CRAWFORD rose.

Mr. PACE. May I say before I yield for a question that it should be borne in mind that the crediting on the war debts and the exchange for surplus agricultural commodities applies only to the materials which are bought from foreign sources and in no way will interfere with the domestic production of any of the materials which are available in this country.

I now yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I just want to say that I feel the gentleman who is now speaking is entitled to some of the credit that may have been given to others. I do not want to detract from the credit that has been given to one of the Senators, although I think the gentleman who is now speaking is deserving of much of the credit for bringing forth the desirability of this suggestion.

Mr. PACE. I appreciate that gracious compliment, but I want to say that at this hour, in view of the condition of the American farmer, I am not looking for credit, but looking for a chance to dispose of some of these surpluses, so that those boys may get back on their feet. [Applause.]

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman from Georgia, who is a very valuable member of our committee, and who has made such an excellent speech, does deserve this credit, and as one of the minority members of our committee, I want to pay him a tribute. I was particularly interested in his discussion of the war debt, and in view of the fact we did fight in the World War and saved the scalps of certain allies, and in view of the fact we spent our treasure and spilt our blood over there, and then after the war was over we shipped them commodities to keep them from starving, and extended them loans that ran into the hundreds of millions and even billions of dollars, does not the gentleman think it ill behooves any American even to contemplate forming an alliance with those people who have shown their gratitude and appreciation by pointing at us a finger of scorn and calling us Shylocks when we try to collect? [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. PACE. I may add, in conclusion, that there is one provoking thing about these war debts. When I observe the warlike activities of the head of the Government in Italy, when I consider the treatment he recently accorded a message of the President of the United States, and I look to this list and see that at this hour Italy owes this Nation in excess of $2,000,000,000 of honest American money, it provokes one almost beyond the limit of patience.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman this question with reference to subsection (b) of section 6: Assuming that we trade cotton, under the present barter plan, in the purchase of these war materials, will it be necessary under this provision for us to subsidize the price of cotton and pay the full price for the material we receive in exchange?

Mr. PACE. It will not. The plan contemplates that there would be an agreed price on cotton, there would be an agreed price on the war materials that we were buying, that they would be exchanged and the exchange would be made on a war basis—that is, the exchange is for defense. Great Britain, for instance, would take our cotton and store it until time of need, in case of war, and we will take their materials and store them and not put them into commercial channels, except for replacements or to avoid depreciation, until they are needed in time of war.

There will be no subsidy necessary. It would save the Nation under the present contemplated subsidy from $50,000,000 to $150,000,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand the gentleman to mean exactly what he said, to the effect that we will take their material, or do we purchase that material outright, by exchange?

Mr. PACE. It is a question of barter and exchange. We exchange so much cotton for so many thousand tons of manganese, for instance.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But the title is placed in us after the trade is made?

Mr. PACE. Unquestionably, but under an agreement that it will not be put into commercial channels except for the purpose of rotation and renewal.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Referring now to section 3 about which I inquired awhile ago, wherein the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to replace acquired stocks of any materials subject to deterioration, and so forth, by such method as he may deem serves the purpose of the act, do I understand now that the gentleman states as a matter of fact that this material will not be thrown into channels of commerce in competition with private industry?

Mr. PACE. Yes. If the gentleman will look to the hearings he will see that the witnesses went into that at considerable length, and he will notice that to accomplish such rotation, the only use that will be made of these materials, which will be put into a stock pile and stored away, will be to dispose of such of the materials as rapidly depreciate, and then, for instance, if it is manganese, and I do not know how fast it depreciates, but slowly, we can take some of the stock material and swap it with the Steel Corporation for recently acquired materials under regulations set up as provided in the bill.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Yes.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. What amount of cotton is contemplated might be used in this exchange?

Mr. PACE. There is no provision about that. As the President has said, or has been reported in the newspapers, as far as cash money is concerned he could not approve over $10,000,000 for next year, but we are hoping that we will immediately purchase ten million worth of materials in cash and that during the year we will be able to negotiate with these nations that have this material or that owe us money and secure the remainder of the $100,000,000 worth of materials through exchange or credit on debts.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. What I wondered is whether anything is in contemplation about the amount of cotton that will be taken.

Mr. PACE. Of course it will be limited to the $100,000,000 worth.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman a moment ago stated that Italy owed us over $2,000,000,000. I am sure the gentleman has some other figures there on the desk. Can he tell us just how much France owes us today?

Mr. PACE. France owed us on November 15, $4,141,000,000.

Mr. SHORT. Almost twice as much as Italy. How much does Great Britain owe us?

Mr. PACE. Five billion three hundred and forty-one million dollars.

Mr. SHORT. My purpose in asking the gentleman these questions is not to refer particularly to Italy, but simply to point out that all of the countries of Europe have defaulted, and not simply to single out a totalitarian state.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

I shall bring the Committee now to the point of view held by the minority at the time this bill was reported to the House. As a result of lengthy hearings and the appearance before the committee of a considerable number of Members of the House interested particularly in that feature having to do with domestic production, the minority, prior to the time the bill was reported, offered an amendment which was rejected in the committee, as follows:

Purchases under this act shall be made in accordance with the Buy American Act of March 3, 1933, and not less than 20 percent of the total amount allotted for the purchase of any given material in any year shall be used for the purchase of domestically produced materials from domestic ores, if offered. Bidders offering such domestic materials shall not be required to supply an advance performance bond, but their materials must meet the specifications called for and shall not be purchased at a premium exceeding the 25 percent authorized in the Buy American Act.

Certain materials referred to in this bill are now available to a certain extent in this country or may become available through further research and development. We thought an amendment of that type or some similar amendment would perfect this bill from the standpoint of protecting and encouraging American industry. I might point out to the Committee that a bill in the Senate which is a companion bill, one might say, to the Faddis bill, and which the Senate passed recently, included some such provision as I have outlined, which was incorporated in the minority views.

With the permission of the Committee I will read that section of the so-called Thomas bill in the Senate, referring to this question. It is section 5 of that bill:

Purchases under this act shall be made in accordance with title III of the act of March 3, 1933, but a reasonable time, not to exceed 1 year, shall be allowed for production and delivery from domestic sources, and in the case of any such material available in the United States, but which has not been developed commercially, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may, if they find that the production of such material is economically feasible, direct the purchase of such material without requiring the vendor to give bond.

Since the passage of the Thomas bill in the Senate and the report, by the House committee, of the Faddis bill, as I understand it, a majority of those interested, particularly in their own congressional districts, both of the majority and the minority, a number of them not members of the Military Affairs Committee, have agreed on an amendment in this connection substantially as follows: It would appear on page 4, line 16, of the bill:

Strike out the period and insert: "And provided further, That purchases under this act shall be made in accordance with the Buy American Act of March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1520), and a reasonable time, in the judgment of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, shall be allowed for the production and delivery from domestic sources."

In an effort to save time this afternoon I should like to ask the chairman of the committee or the author of the bill, Mr. Faddis, whether they might consider the acceptance of this amendment just as I have read it? It is an amendment which has been agreed upon by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] and other Members greatly interested.

Mr. MAY. As far as I am concerned, the part of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] which provides for the enforcement of the provisions of the Buy American Act will be satisfactory, and we have an amendment already drawn to that effect, as far as that is concerned; but I would just like to call the gentleman's attention to the further provision in his amendment which provides that—

Not less than 20 percent of the total amount allotted for the purchase of any given material in any year shall be used for the purchase of domestically produced materials.

I just had an analysis made of that suggestion the other day by a gentleman who claimed to be a producer of manganese, and he said this—and I agree with him—that under the gentleman's amendment, if only 20 percent was allowed for domestic purposes, one large producer might get the whole contract, and other producers, who might develop mines in other sections of the country and thereby bring about a general development in all States, would be defeated. To that extent I would object to the gentleman's amendment, but I readily agree with the Buy American provision.

Mr. ANDREWS. I believe the gentleman misunderstood me. While that was the original amendment, since then we have agreed on the amendment which I read, which is as follows:

And provided further, That purchases under this act shall be made in accordance with the Buy American Act of March 3, 1933 (47 Stats. 1520), and a reasonable time, in the judgment of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, shall be allowed for the production and delivery from domestic sources.

It is that amendment which I am asking the chairman of the committee whether he will accept?

Mr. MAY. If the gentleman will submit a copy of the amendment, I will be glad to consider it with a view to agreeing to it if we can do so. I have no disposition to be contrary about it.

Mr. ANDREWS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out one thing more about the bill from the standpoint of the minority Members. The original bill, as written by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] provided for the sum of $100,000,000 out of any money in the Treasury. I might call attention to the fact that the President, in a statement publicly made and otherwise, has made it known that he does not favor an appropriation of more than $10,000,000. I doubt if there is any Member of the minority who has been in the habit, at the present time, at least, of jumping ahead of the President on the expenditure of funds. I might call attention further to the fact that the Senate bill, which originally provided for $100,000,000, by amendment in the Senate was cut to $10,000,000. Certainly with the viewpoint of the President known, his expression having been received, it seems to me that the limit should be reduced from $100,000,000 to $40,000,000, or not more than $10,000,000 in any one year; and we intend to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, first I want to compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] for the work he has done during the last 5 years on this subject. Most of you will recall the bill which was passed in the previous Congress, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania was the author, which limited the exporting of scrap tin, in order to conserve one of our resources. The subject is one in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been very much interested and upon which he has done a great deal of work in conjunction not only with the men from the Army and the Bureau of Mines but the National Resources Committee and others who have studied this subject. His work with that of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] as to the use of agricultural surplus commodities has been outstanding in this session.

We have heard very little, it seems to me, against the desirability of this legislation. We need these materials which we cannot produce in sufficient quantity in this country. We have little argument today on the floor against the necessity for some such legislation.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] has mentioned the amount of the authorization. The four most essential materials included in this bill, namely, manganese, tungsten, chrome, and tin, would require about $100,000,000 to build up a sufficient supply to give us a year's reserve for the normal peace-time needs of this country. This, roughly, is the basis of the authorization. We expect to authorize somewhat less than a full year's supply of these various commodities. Some of them can be produced in this country to some extent; but as to 11 of them, the War Department, the Bureau of Mines, and the Geological Survey feel that they should be placed in a category by themselves.

We would need somewhat more than $100,000,000 to furnish a sufficient stock pile of all these materials. We had hoped to make a real start on a material stock pile with whatever appropriation we authorized in this bill. I think we should not set the authorization at less than the $100,000,000. The amount of money which will be made available is another question and must be taken up with the Committee on Appropriations in conjunction with the question of how much of these materials we can get by swapping surplus agricultural commodities, and, if possible, by credit on the war debts. It seems that we may acquire some by swapping surplus agricultural commodities. The State Department has gone into the question pretty thoroughly, and while some of those who have testified do not think specific authorization is needed, there is, nevertheless, a question in the minds of some of us about this need. I believe we shall be on the safe side if we give this authorization, retaining the limit of $100,000,000 set in this bill, for then there can be no question as to the power of the State Department in conjunction with these other departments to use agricultural commodities for the acquisition of the minerals we need without having to negotiate and have ratified a treaty. It is probable that if they succeed in making an agreement with the British they will bring in some treaty, but if we pass this authorization, we shall have an authorization within the limits set by this bill to use agricultural commodities without the need of further action by treaty. I think we can safely do that, and I think and I believe it is one reason we should keep the authorization at the full amount set in the bill even though we do not this year appropriate the full amount that we authorize.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Has it occurred to the gentleman that it would be an excellent plan if we could exchange manufactured products, such as cotton and woolen clothing, boots and shoes, in exchange for raw materials?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Then we would be getting into a system of barter. As to the agricultural commodities the set-up is different, for the Government today is in possession of large quantities of surplus agricultural commodities that it has acquired in conjunction with farm programs. It offers a chance to take them out of the world market, to set them aside as military reserves, and to keep them from hanging as a threat over the market. I believe this is desirable; but as for getting into a system of barter, I do believe it would not be desirable to place such a provision in this bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It would afford a great deal of employment, and we have millions unemployed.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. We need these raw materials now primarily as a reserve, and the principal object of this bill is to acquire them, if we can, by the exchange of agricultural commodities without defeating the purpose of the bill. I favor this, but to go beyond the exchange of raw materials would make a very complicated problem.

One item about which there has been a great deal of controversy is manganese. I think argument over this controversy has held up such legislation as this for some years. The lobby of the Manganese Producers' Association has been very active not only in this Congress but in prior Congresses insisting that we should provide for the acquisition of domestic manganese. Your committee wants to help domestic producers. It would be far more desirable, of course, if we could develop a domestic source of supply sufficiently large that we could depend upon it in time of war rather than having to acquire manganese abroad.

There is no question about that. We have held hearings for many years on this subject but to the present we have had no testimony on which we could depend as to the ability of domestic manganese producers to turn out a sufficient quantity of the proper grade of manganese to supply the needs of our steel industry in wartime. Reading the hearings you will see that last year in an attempt to get the latest and the best unbiased evidence on this question $100,000 of W. P. A. funds was used for a survey by the Bureau of Mines of the domestic manganese industry. Their latest report, which came since the hearings closed, is incorporated in the printed hearings and will be found at page 212. It is an unbiased report and covers all these materials. The report is signed by John Wellington Finch, the Director of the Bureau of Mines.

The Bureau of Mines and other Government agencies believe that even though we encourage the domestic manganese industry we could not in any sufficient time set up an industry to take care of our war needs for manganese. Could this be done the War Department would prefer it, but we have no evidence that we can do it. It is true that promoters have come before the committee claiming various things. Producers have come before the committee and told us that the Buy American Act which is tied into the bill would enable them to do it. It was necessary to put a specific provision in the bill—and it is in the bill now—to make the tariff apply. Given this 50-percent tariff protection and the additional 25-percent advantage of the Buy American Act, one of our producers states that we can produce it domestically.

Mr. Chairman, one domestic producer says that is sufficient to protect him, that he can expand, but he does not claim he can produce the major part of our yearly needs.

We have done another thing in this bill to try to promote the domestic production of these various articles. We have provided a yearly appropriation of $500,000 for the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey for investigation to discover deposits, to analyze them, and to figure out new methods of using them in order to get them into production to meet our deficiencies, which we all know exist.

That is an advantage which has not existed heretofore. It is more than has ever been done for the manganese producers by their lobby in all the years it has been operating here. It is an effort by the committee to encourage domestic production.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. The distinguished gentleman from Connecticut is undoubtedly aware of the fact that the domestic industry was given a tariff protection of 1 cent per pound?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. At one time; yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Or $20 a ton. This, as I recall, was reduced to $10 a ton in the Brazilian treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Yes; but under neither situation has the domestic industry been able to produce 10 percent of our domestic needs.

Mr. KNUTSON. Simply because we cannot expect the American industry to compete with India, Brazil, and the other places where they have peon labor. If you could persuade the American miner to accept Brazilian and Indian wages, we could compete with the world in the production of manganese.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. That argument has been made, but the Bureau of Mines does not in its report agree that the domestic industry can be developed under tariff protection alone.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to speak in behalf of the minority report of the Committee on Military Affairs, as set out in Report No. 283, part II, and which urges consideration by Congress of a plan to encourage domestic producers to build up the domestic production of strategic materials. The minority report suggests that purchases under this act shall be made in accordance with the Buy American Act of March 30, 1933.

It is my view that Congress should, to this very reasonable extent, start active encouragement that may lead to further research and development which may lead to a greater degree of independence of our Government in the matter of securing these strategic materials. My interest in speaking to you at this time is purely in the interest of national defense.

Throughout our hearings on this important measure I was impressed with the importance of acquiring a stock pile of the four materials—manganese, chrome, tungsten, and tin—that are described in greatest detail in the committee report, No. 283. You will note that the committee makes the statement that these materials are either entirely lacking in this country or are produced in very limited quantities, incapable of marked expansion, and that supplies must be imported over long ocean routes.

The Legislative Reference Service has very kindly prepared the production and export figures for chrome, manganese, tin, and tungsten in all the countries listed in the committee report as the principal sources of these strategic materials for each year from 1909 to 1937, inclusive. I am sorry I did not get these tables in time to include them in the hearings.

They have also prepared a table setting out the production and foreign-trade figures of the United States for chrome ore, manganese, tin, and tungsten for the same years, 1909–37, inclusive.

These tables reveal the influence of the stress of the World War period and its stimulation of domestic production of chrome ore, manganese, and tungsten. Even under the stress of World War demand, our domestic production of tin was relatively negligible.

Following the World War, the domestic production of even chrome and manganese very rapidly declined and today our domestic production of them amounts to only a small fraction of our total needs. In the case of tungsten the domestic production also declined rapidly following the World War, but it has shown considerable increase within the past few years.

For the last 5 years, for which total figures are available, 1933–37, inclusive, our total imports of chrome ore were approximately 1,446,000 long tons; and our domestic production was approximately 4,200 long tons, or about one-third of 1 percent of the total. Our imports of manganese ore, not including manganiferous ores, were approximately 1,400,000 long tons, while our domestic production for that period was approximately 144,000 long tons, or about 10 percent of the total. Our production of manganiferous ores is much more encouraging by way of comparison than manganese, as revealed in these tables. Our imports of tungsten for that period were approximately 7,000 short tons, and our domestic production was approximately 11,000 short tons, or about 60 percent of the total.

During the 5 years, 1914–18, inclusive, our imports of chrome ore were approximately 425,000 long tons and our domestic production amounted to approximately 177,000 long tons, or about 30 percent of the total. In manganese ore, not including manganiferous ores, our imports were approximately 2,295,000 long tons and our production was approximately 479,000 long tons, or about 18 percent of the total. The total imports of tungsten during that period were approximately 19,000 long tons, and the domestic production was approximately that same amount, or 50 percent of the total.

It is my own opinion that the domestic production of manganese can be greatly stimulated with proper and reasonable encouragement, especially if sufficient encouragement be given to the production and use of manganiferous ores of less than 35-percent grade. From the standpoint of developing our own self-sufficiency in the field of national defense, it is my own view that the Federal Government should take reasonable steps to encourage the development of production of these strategic materials wherever possible.

INCREASE THE TOTAL STOCK PILE

There is one point I wish to emphasize in connection with this bill. Its purpose should be to increase the total stock piles of strategic materials in our Nation. Our passage of this bill will be of very little defense value if the officials charged with the administration thereof use it only as authority for a bookkeeping transaction with the owners of privately owned stocks. These officials should take notice that in the passing of this bill Congress is trying to build up the total available stock pile of strategic materials. The War Department officials, in hearings before the committee, revealed a sincere interest in this purpose.

I am mentioning this point here only because I have received a copy of a letter written by the American Manganese Producers' Association to Hon. A. J. MAY, chairman of our committee, stating that in their opinion the total stock pile of manganese in the United States will be no larger at the end of the first year than now exists, and I want to say that the officials of the War Department to whom I have talked demonstrated a far better understanding of the true purpose of this bill than is implied by the statement of the American Manganese Producers' Association.

HOW LARGE SHOULD THE AUTHORIZATION BE?

Some very interesting discussion took place in committee regarding the size of the authorization. At no time during committee hearings and during committee discussion was any official report presented from either the War Department or the Budget favoring the authorization of the expenditure of $100,000,000, as provided in this bill.

We are all now familiar with the President's opposition to the expenditure of more than $10,000,000 for these purposes in the coming fiscal year. When I find our President, and Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, recommending a sum far less than that included in our committee recommendation, I am inclined to follow the recommendation of the President. As Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, he is in position to know our needs, and I have not yet met a situation in the field of national defense wherein I have felt that he has underestimated them. For that reason, I will support any amendment offered to this bill that has for its purpose the reduction of the authorization to $10,000,000 per year. That, I believe, will be adequate for the needs as recommended by the President and at the same time more economical.

You may be told in the course of this debate that we should authorize the full $100,000,000 and leave it to the Committee on Appropriations to recommend such sums as the exigencies of the occasion may require, but it is my position that such loose and extravagant authorization measures can only deprive the Committee on Military Affairs of their true function in this House, namely, the careful study of our needs in the field of national defense. [Applause.]

The tables referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] are as follows:

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this measure, but not because I feel it is an emergency war measure. Personally, I do not believe we are in danger of going to war with any foreign country if we keep our feet on the ground. [Applause.] No foreign nation dare attack us at home. I also feel that the Congress of the United States for the first and last time about 20 years ago voted to finance a war on foreign soil and send our American boys across a water expanse of 3,000 miles to fight and die in foreign lands for a futile dream of peace among European nations whose history denies that they were ever at peace. I do not believe the Congress of the United States will ever repeat that tragedy. [Applause.]

I am for this bill because it will give encouragement to the development of our mines in the United States, and particularly in my own State of Montana. We produce in Butte, Mont., alone, as my colleague from Montana will verify, in the neighborhood of 70,000 tons of manganese ore per annum.

We have large bodies of chromite in the Stillwater Valley of eastern Montana that are now unexplored and unexploited. I hope the chairman of the committee will add to the excellent work he has already done in bringing this bill upon the floor of the House by agreeing to an amendment that will provide for purchase in accordance with the Buy American Act of such products as manganese, chromite, and other strategic minerals that may be produced in the United States. If we do nothing else, we will have served our country well in accomplishing this one thing.

Mr. Chairman, we shall really do nothing to restore prosperity and increase employment in this country by the purchase of foreign metals when we have the same minerals here at home.

One of the surprises of the war period was a large production of manganese ore in Montana. In 1916 general attention was directed to the manganiferous deposits by the shipment of rather large quantities of high-grade manganese oxide ore from Phillipsburg. In 1917 the production in that district so greatly increased that Montana jumped far ahead of the other States producing manganese ore. Reports from the operators in 1918 show a minimum reserve of 125,000 tons of high-grade carbonate ore and an additional very large amount in prospect. The total amount of high-grade manganese ore, including the carbonate and oxide varieties, in Montana is at least 250,000 tons, or somewhat more than one-third of the total amount estimated for the country. This writer believes that the expectation of finding very large additional amounts of carbonate ore is warranted.

Chromite is found in a belt of pyroxenites and peridotites near the south border of Montana, in Sweet Grass and Stillwater Counties. The belt starts on the Boulder River, in Sweet Grass County, 10 miles south of McLeod, and extends in a general direction 15 degrees south of east for 27 miles to Fishtail Creek, in Stillwater County. A smaller deposit of chromite some 25 miles to the southeast, near Red Lodge, is not a part of this belt. The mode of occurrence gives every reason to believe that the ore extends for considerable distances below the surface, perhaps 1,000 feet or more. Chromite is also found on claims near Washoe, 10 miles southwest of Red Lodge. Although no approach to an accurate estimate is at present possible, it is the belief of the writer that the estimate of 375,000 tons is a low estimate for the belt as a whole. If that amount of ore is not ultimately recovered, it will not be because the ore is not in the ground. It should be noted that the form of occurrence of the chromite in this belt is radically different from that of deposits farther west, in California and Oregon, and that there is much stronger reason for counting on continuity in depth here than there.

The development of our own natural resources has been placed as a secondary consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs, according to the committee's report. The first point in the committee's report on the bill is based on the alleged immediate need of national-defense precautions. It appears to me that the protection of the American market for the American producer is suffering under the supposition of an immediate war danger.

The report states:

> The principle involved being by the placing of educational orders with factories adapted to the production of noncommercial articles; that is, those not of commercial value other than in the national-defense picture; and it is likewise felt that, inasmuch as such strategic and critical materials as manganese, tungsten, tin, and rubber are now very largely obtained from foreign sources, if a general war, which is not at this time unlikely, should occur, the lines of trade and commerce with foreign countries might be severed * * *.

At the same time the report points out that American producers are capable of providing a great tonnage to the American market if the foreign imports are unavailable. The report states (p. 203):

> During the World War, when prices were high, the domestic industries, particularly the manganese industry, was encouraged to make further and additional development of their mines and properties that production of manganese in particular, which is regarded by the committee and by the War Department a strategic mineral No. 1 in matter of importance, rose from a domestic production of 2,635 tons in 1914, with 31 producers engaged in the industry, and within the 3 years thereafter, going up to 1918, the production went up from this small tonnage to 305,869 tons, and the number of producers from 31 to 247, and this is quite convincing that if the industry, then in its infancy, practically dormant, could revive to that extent, that with modern equipment and machinery now available from many sources, and with trial orders sufficient to give encouragement to further development, our domestic sources * * * within a period of some 4 or 5 years, we would probably be independent of foreign sources for supplies.

Excerpts from the testimony presented by James W. Furness, Chief of the Economics and Statistics Branch of the Bureau of Mines, before the Committee on Military Affairs during consideration of the measure now before the House, are particularly significant as concerns the production of manganese in Montana.

On page 83 of the hearings report, Mr. Furness stated:

> The manganese content of manganese ores imported into the United States is consistently around 47 percent.

Speaking of production in Montana on page 89, Mr. Furness said:

> The grade of the ore is raised (through a processing plant) from approximately 30 percent to more than 60 percent.

And on page 91, Mr. Furness stated:

> Butte can produce ore not only higher grade than any other source that we now know, but it can produce a comparatively high tonnage as compared with the domestic production, but not compared with the tonnage imported.

The chairman of the committee on page 93 asked Mr. Furness the following question:

> Then you tell us there has been a developed production of about 70,000 tons a year out at Butte, Mont., and now what has your committee done toward finding about these other States besides Montana? How many other places have you got a production of 70,000 tons a year?

Mr. Furness answered:

> Nowhere else.

Tables on page 3 of the reprint of a chapter entitled "Manganese and Manganiferous Ores" from the Minerals Yearbook, 1938, prepared by the Bureau of Mines, show the amounts of metallurgical manganese and ferruginous manganese ore shipped from Montana and other States from 1933 to 1937.

The tables show that Montana shipped 16,854 long tons, or two-third of the entire amount shipped from United States mine, of metallurgical manganese ore in 1937. In 1936, Montana shipped 5,154 long tons; in 1935, 2,155 long tons; in 1934, 1,657 long tons; and in 1933, 987 long tons.

Montana was second high in 1937 among States shipping ferruginous manganese ore with 19,660 long tons, a slight decrease from the figure in 1936. Shipments of ferruginous manganese ore from Montana in 1936 totaled 20,307 long tons; in 1935, 6,818 long tons; in 1934, 11,247 long tons.

Now when the committee report states that "the important strategic raw materials—manganese, chromium, tungsten, and tin—are either lacking in this country or are produced in very limited quantities incapable of marked expansion," it is paradoxical to the preceding production figures in Montana alone.

Montana alone is capable of producing 70,000 tons of high-grade manganese annually. Domestic manganese is not "entirely lacking" or "incapable of marked expansion," as stated in the committee report.

Furthermore we have a record tonnage of imported strategic metals, particularly manganese, in stock piles today. Surely we must give all consideration possible to domestic producers and under no circumstances must we purchase from foreign producers under the pretense of a war mania.

The committee report shows that we can produce manganese and chrome in the United States. It is far better to develop our domestic resources rather than to continue to purchase foreign materials. You cannot put men to work in the United States by purchasing foreign strategic materials.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those old-fashioned Americans who believe we should patronize home industry. I can see no reason whatever for including manganese in this measure. As I recall, from 35 to 38 States in the Union have large deposits of manganese. It was for the purpose of developing these deposits that a tariff rate of $20 per ton was imposed in the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act. Under the beneficent influence of this protection there was rapid development of the American manganese industry, but in negotiating the trade agreement with Brazil we very generously reduced that tariff rate of $20 per ton to $10 per ton, which practically shut down all American manganese mines because their operators could not compete with countries where the wage scale is but a fraction of what it is in this country. When we reduced the tariff rate on manganese in the Brazilian treaty that benefit automatically was extended to Cuba, Russia, India, and other large producers of manganese, where the going wage scale is about 25 to 50 cents a day.

Of course, you are never going to develop the American manganese deposits with a tariff rate of $10 per ton; in fact, it would need at least $20, and there are those who say we would need perhaps a $25 tariff. But I notice that when the $20 rate was in effect the manganese mines in Minnesota were operating, and I notice that the imports at that time were comparatively small. Of course, the large steel manufacturers want cheap manganese. They want to buy their manganese in Cuba and Brazil and in India and in Russia, because they can buy it there for a fraction of the amount for which the American miner can produce it.

It seems to me the time has come when we should restore the bars that are so essential to the welfare of agriculture and industry in this country. The gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR] called attention to the deposits in his State. The gentleman believes the passage of this measure will help the mining industry in Montana. The gentleman is a bigger optimist than I am. I do not believe we are going to get a dollar out of this program. I do not believe the State of Montana will get anything out of it. Of course, we have worried along with these trade agreements now for the past 4 or 5 years, and I guess we can stand for it another 18 months. Then we are going to have a change.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I have only 5 minutes. I am sorry.

Mr. SHEPPARD. So am I.

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. In the meanwhile we shall continue to operate soup kitchens and W. P. A. and P. W. A. and all these other economic monstrosities that only dreamers and visionaries could concoct. Fortunately, we are returning to sanity. That was shown in a number of States last fall. Unless all signs fail, we are going to have a Republican landslide in 1940. But I pity the man who is elected President, because he will not in one term be able to clean up the mess he will find, so he will have to reconcile himself to being a one-termer. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, when I came here in January 1937 as a new Member, one of the first Members of this body I met was the gentleman from Nevada, Congressman SCRUGHAM. He said to me in a private conversation that we ought to try to put in some military or naval appropriation bill an item for say $10,000,000 to provide for laying in a stock pile of strategic war materials. I said, "Governor, I do not know much about that. You as an artillery officer in 1917 probably got an insight of the country's need." He said, "Exactly so. The country was in desperate need for them when we entered the war."

You will recall that the House in 1937 put in the naval appropriation bill an item for $5,000,000, which was cut to $3,500,000, and passed. This was a starter. I recall that the Committee on Military Affairs was kind enough to listen to me on May 18 of 1937 when the preceding Faddis bill was before that committee. It also provided that a stock pile should be gathered of strategic materials from abroad. I believe the original Faddis bill provided that these materials should be obtained from abroad as part payment of the war debts. It occurred to me at that time, as it does today, that there is very little likelihood of our getting any money from the nations who owe us these debts. We are getting strategic materials from Russia, but I believe Russia intends never to pay her war debt to us. Therefore, I do not have very much hope that we shall get much of these materials from some of the nations abroad which owe us money, for some of the countries that can best produce the materials we need do not owe us war debts and some that owe us war debts will not pay us in that way.

I have heard something said here today about additional national expense and the mounting debt. I should like to ask if you ever knew a businessman to build a $5,000 or $10,000 frame dwelling and then as an economy matter fail to take out fire insurance on that dwelling. I believe we might go ahead and vote our millions and billions as a matter of national defense and for other purposes and fail to pass some such legislation as this, and thus exhibit the same lack of judgment the man who builds a $10,000 frame house exhibits when he fails to take out a fire-insurance policy on the house.

Why am I here advocating this bill in general? Am I a spokesman for the American Manganese Association? By no means. Am I here speaking for some promotion concern in Arizona? By no means. I do know, and I can back up this statement of my colleagues from the West, that there are great deposits of these strategic materials all over the West. I heard the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] say there is enough manganese in South Dakota to match all the iron ore in the country. I have just heard the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR] say we are producing great quantities of manganese at Butte.

My other colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON], has just said we are producing it out in Minnesota. I do know there are millions of tons of manganese ore in sight out at Artillery Peak in Mohave County, Ariz. I do know that I have received many letters and telegrams from my constituents in Arizona saying, "help the small mine owners," in many, many ways which I have not time to enumerate.

It has been suggested that we do not have these strategic materials in this country. I cannot believe that. I have it on the word of the dean of the School of Mines of the University of Arizona, and other eminent authorities, that there is a vast supply of manganese, for instance, at Artillery Peak, Mohave County, Ariz., and I know there is a vast supply of tungsten in the State of Arizona. I believe we have no need, from the standpoint of conserving our present stock to meet future needs—and there is no man in this House who takes more interest in posterity and preserving for posterity what we ought to preserve for it than myself.

I am not speaking now for the American Manganese Association, neither do I speak for great steel manufacturing concerns. I want that to be distinctly understood. I am very much interested in the steel industry of this country in general and I know that manganese, for instance, is the very backbone of the steel industry. We must not depend upon foreigners for this. I do not want our great steel-manufacturing concerns to continue indefinitely to get their supply of cheap manganese from low-paid labor abroad when they ought to get it at home.

As a matter of national defense, and that is my primary interest in this bill, I want us to have not only a present stock pile, and I am willing to get it from Russia, or China, or any place else right now within the next 30 days, if it can be done, and I am going along with this bill with that understanding, but I do not want that thing to become the Nation's fixed policy. It is of the future years I am thinking. That we may have a long-time national defense, we ought to begin now to produce what we can produce and what we know we can produce in this country. So I am hoping for an amendment to this bill looking in that direction.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. If I have the time; yes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I know the gentleman is familiar with the great contribution made by American prospectors of the West in developing our mineral resources, and I am just wondering if a part of the money appropriated in this bill for exploration for these critical and strategic materials could not be well allotted to those prospectors in the way of grubstakes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I think that is true. I would like to see that done.

Mining throughout the great West is now stagnant. It is one of the great industries on which all of our prosperity depends. We ought to do that and we ought to liberalize the rules of the S. E. C., and we ought to liberalize Reconstruction Finance loans. We ought to do everything possible to induce new and private capital to enter into the development of western mines, not big mines only, but also small mines. Every day I get many letters from the small mines' associations, of which there are about 50 councils organized all over the State, asking for just these things.

I tell you, Mr. Chairman, we all know and speak about the importance of manufacturing and farming, but the great extractive industry of taking wealth from Mother Earth is basic and parental, and I want to emphasize that.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I am interested in the manufacture of steel, I am interested in farming, I am interested in mining, but I want to stress this thought before my time expires. I am basically interested in national defense, and we cannot have a national-defense policy unless we somehow split the difference between two opposing schools of thought with respect to this matter. Get your immediate stock pile at once, get it abroad, by exchanging cotton, if you please, but see to it that year after next we get these minerals right out of the soil of America.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I will have to yield first to my friend over on this side.

Mr. SHORT. I may say to the gentleman from Arizona that he has really answered the question I had in mind. The gentleman has made a very splendid statement, and while we should do everything in our power to encourage industries in this country, due to the present emergency, I am pleased that the gentleman states he is willing for us to import these four strategic materials.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I thank the gentleman from Missouri. Yes; I am willing and anxious that they be imported for only a short time.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROMJUE. If legislation of this kind had been enacted when we entered the World War, would it not have saved much time and millions of dollars?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. It certainly would, and that is one of the points I wish to cover next. We have been told here that the Government spent a lot of money 20 years ago doing what we are asked to do now, but let me remind you that we did not begin that program until after the war started. We had better begin now before war starts, for fear we may have a war, and I hope my colleague, the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR] is correct that we are not going to have any war. I pay money out for accident insurance, and hope never to need to collect a cent.

One more thing. Matters have changed in 20 years. New processes have been developed. I understand there is an electric process now for refining manganese ore so that we can have, wherever there is cheap power, manganese ore produced suitable to our trade which could not be done 20 years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to trespass on the time of the Committee this afternoon, except to say that several Members on the floor on both sides—yes, even some on the majority—have asked me if I think this is a good bill. I feel highly flattered that any majority Member would ask my opinion of any piece of legislation, but I am happy to state that I think I am correct when I say that the Committee on Military Affairs is unanimously in favor of this legislation. It is a good bill. Its quick enactment is both desirable and necessary. I pause long enough to extend my congratulations and appreciation to our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] and the author of the bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], both of whom have given much time and serious study to this particular legislation. We all know that it is absolutely useless for us to build battleships, tanks, semiautomatic rifles, artillery, antiaircraft guns, and so forth, unless we have something to shoot out of those guns, and the four strategic materials covered in this legislation—manganese, tungsten, tin, and chromium—are essential materials in warfare. Modern war cannot be waged without them. They are indispensable. I think that the provision in the pending legislation whereby we shall attempt to secure tin and rubber from some of our former allies to apply on the war debt they owe us is a very good provision, although I do not expect us to get a dollar's worth of any commodity by applying it on the war debt. It is regrettable that a more serious and determined effort has not been made to collect these war debts or to take them out in trade; and, since we do not have much faith or hope in getting tin and rubber by applying their cost to the credit of our debtor nations, I think the provision of bartering excess cotton and wheat for these strategic war materials is a wise one. I deeply appreciate the efforts of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], along with those of the distinguished junior Senator from South Carolina, who brought this to the attention of the American people. I hope that as we secure these war materials and build up our own national defense that we will keep in mind at all times that it is all for defense purposes only, and while we want munitions and materials of war to shoot out of these cannon and guns, let us hope and pray that we may never have to shoot any of it except in practice. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON].

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to know that our genial friend from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] is in hearty accord with the purposes of this bill, because I feel that we are all now pretty well agreed that the 3 hours' debate allotted to us is hardly necessary. I shall yield a part of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

As has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT], the chairman of the committee has rendered distinguished service in reporting this bill, but I recall that for the last 3 years the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] has had a bill of this kind before the Committee on Military Affairs, but it is only a recent thing that so much attention has been attracted to this particular legislation.

I was interested in what the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] had to say, that this is primarily a national-defense measure. This is no tariff bill. This does not involve reciprocal-trade agreements or anything of that sort. This is a bill that the War Department and the Navy Department say is absolutely necessary for proper and adequate national defense. It is not necessary to recount the lack of supplies of this kind that we needed during the World War. Along with the national-defense bill we passed last month, this is just another part of a program to accumulate these stock piles, so that we will not be caught in any such predicament as we found ourselves in during the World War. It does have a twofold purpose, because in addition to the national defense it gives encouragement to the American mining industry. I live away down at El Paso, where there is a big smelter and likewise a large copper refinery. My people are interested in mining, and I think near my own city there is a tin mine which has now been abandoned for some years, but I know some good mining men who believe that with just a little encouragement it could be made to produce in paying quantity. Tin is one of the scarcest materials that we have in this country. I want to assist and encourage the mining business. The owners and operators deserve encouragement, and this program will also assist employment.

I want to see the mining industry of the entire country prosper. I am one of those who believes that we can always depend upon the War Department and the Navy Department, so long as it is consistent with national defense, to give preference to the domestic producer. If you will read carefully the testimony of those who spoke for the War Department and the Navy Department, as disclosed by the hearings, you will find that in every instance both the War Department and the Navy Department have always given preference to American production where the proper quality and quantity of mineral could be obtained.

So it seems to me, in view of the fact that the chairman of the committee and the ranking member on the minority side have agreed on the Buy American amendment to the bill, there is little need for further discussion or for any roll call, because this Congress has already demonstrated it is tremendously interested in national defense, and that is all there is left to this bill. [Applause.]

I think it is a very fine piece of legislation, and I am anxious to see this bill go to conference in order that any differences existing between this bill and the so-called Thomas bill shall be ironed out and the bill become law quite soon, in order that the Procurement Division of the Treasury and the procurement division of the Army, the Navy, and the Bureau of Mines shall begin operation under this bill. We have been talking about it for 3 or 4 years. It will encourage those interested in national defense, but likewise it will be a great stimulus to the domestic mining industry of this country.

I want to again pay my tribute of thanks to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] and all others, including the chairman of the committee [Mr. MAY], the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE], the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK], and many others who have been so largely interested in this important legislation for 3 or 4 years, but only now begin to see the fruition of their efforts.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON. I yield.

Mr. LEAVY. I notice in this bill there is a provision for $500,000 additional to the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey for research and exploratory work. I think that is a very commendable and splendid thing. If they, in the course of this research and exploration work, should make findings that we have these strategic minerals in America, then would we be in a position to automatically stop this storing up and making purchases abroad?

Mr. THOMASON. Oh, I do not think there is any doubt about it. The committee was unanimously in accord with the views just expressed by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY]. That is a fine provision in this law, but, of course, if you judge the War Department and the Navy Department by their past records, as well as the promises made by their spokesmen in the hearings, the gentleman from Washington and every other Member of this body, as well as every American citizen, need have no fear whatever that the War and Navy Departments will immediately seize upon that new development as a result of the exploratory and experimental work, and give all the purchases to home production.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Miss SUMNER].

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there are many here today who, like lawyers, believe that the best defense is thorough preparation. This, therefore, is a strategic time to point out to you the horrible truth that we are leaving to potential enemies of the United States the power to gain control of our supply of a very important war material—zinc.

If war should come—and the people are looking to this Congress to prevent war—there must be zinc in every cartridge that is fired.

Some of the gentlemen here may fancy that we have an adequate supply of zinc. We have mines in Missouri and New Jersey, we have zinc-processing plants in Missouri, Illinois, and, I am informed, in Wisconsin.

The truth is, however, that American zinc industries are now being rapidly destroyed by an undeclared price war, which is the direct result of the treaty with Canada which went into effect last January. [Applause.]

Our industries cannot possibly compete with zinc industries in foreign countries. We have wage and hour laws; we have high taxes; the social-security tax in the zinc-processing plant in my district, for instance, near Danville, Ill.—Danville, you will remember, was "Uncle Joe" Cannon's home town—amounts to $100 a day. Last year, due to this treaty, this one plant lost a quarter of a million dollars. Already the operators have been forced by the treaty to discharge hundreds of men. The situation is the same everywhere in the American zinc industry.

I am told that those in the State Department profess not to understand how a treaty which became effective in January might have caused a loss last year; but, fortunately for the United States, there are some Members here who know business and business ways; who can appreciate that in an industry like this, where prices are quoted 4 months in advance, the effect of a treaty in January is to reduce prices at least 4 months before January; who know that a plant, in order to hold customers, will reduce its prices down below cost; who may also see that no zinc plant can go on very long losing money at the rate of a quarter of a million dollars a year.

Fortunately, there is one chance left to remedy this perilous condition—the treaty referred to comes up for review next month.

We have already learned that America needs that Congressmen shall be more than "little Sir Echoes" of an administration.

So I am hoping that those of you who are welcome at the White House will on your next visit there carry with you this thought: That it is not going to do America much good to buy millions of dollars worth of guns with which to frighten so-called aggressors if the so-called aggressors have up their sleeves the assurance that through the Secretary of State we are signing away the power to produce the stuff of which our bullets must be made. Thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON].

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall support this bill for the full amount it authorizes, $100,000,000. I look upon it not as a war measure because we use manganese in peacetime as well as in wartime.

Manganese is produced in Montana, and our Montana producers are not asking any aid in its production. We have well-developed ore bodies and we have flotation plants and nodulizing plants in Montana. These plants represent the investment of many millions of dollars. We can produce on 24 hours' notice at the rate of 70,000 tons of manganese per year. After 3 months of operation we can produce at the rate of 140,000 tons per year, and after 4 years of operation we can produce at the rate of approximately 400,000 tons per year. This production is of 60-percent manganese as compared with imported manganese which runs only about 47 percent.

I am interested in another phase of this bill. My colleagues on the left speak about spending money. Here is an opportunity to stop spending money by allowing our mines to operate and employ the people of Montana who are now idle. This will reduce the W. P. A. pay rolls and at the same time add to the production of needed materials. I believe our own industries are entitled to this much consideration not only as a war measure but as a peace measure. I shall, therefore, give my full support to this bill carrying as it does authorization for $100,000,000. [Applause.]

I am speaking in behalf of H. R. 5191.

My State does not ask any aid of any kind from the Government to develop a manganese resource. Developed ore bodies, a commercial flotation process, and nodulizing plant are already in existence, representing several million dollars of investment.

One operation at Butte can start producing the highest grade nodulized manganese ore in the world with fewer impurities than any known ore. This operation can start within 24 hours' notice. Furthermore, it is the only known ore which has been used 100 percent straight in a blast furnace; that is, it does not have to be blended with other ores.

This operation has a present capacity of 70,000 long tons of nodulized ore per year and the owners would be willing to double this capacity, which would mean 140,000 tons per year. Doubling this capacity can be accomplished in 3 months' time if necessary. I am advised that the ore supply for such production is adequate.

Another phase of this situation, which seems to me of vital importance at this time, is the number of men that would be employed in my district alone. I am informed that steady and gainful employment would be given to 415 men per day on a 70,000-ton of nodulized manganese ore per year basis and approximately a thousand men on a 140,000-ton per year basis.

Within the 4-year period which this bill covers I have no doubt that the manganese resources of Phillipsburg, Mont., will come in for more intensive development, as they were heavily drawn on during the World War. At the end of the 4-year period I predict that my State alone will produce a large percentage of the United States requirements.

From the title of this bill I gather that it is the will and intent of Congress to, first, provide for a stock pile insofar as possible from domestic sources, and secondly, to develop sources of strategic raw materials in this country, to the end that such materials may be removed from said strategic list. I consider it my duty, therefore, to insist that American production and American labor be given every and all preference over foreign producers, such as Cuba, Russia, India, Africa, and Brazil.

It is my conviction that this amendment should be adopted, as it will bring the proposed bill, H. R. 5191, in line with the Thomas bill, S. 572, which has already passed the Senate by a vote of 59 to 13.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I am highly appreciative of the courtesy, the patience, and the industry exhibited by my colleagues on the Committee on Military Affairs in assisting in the preparation and presentation of this legislation. Since I have been a member of this committee I do not believe any subject has come before it the hearings on which stretched over a longer time or involved the examination of more witnesses than did the hearings on this subject. There was a full attendance of the committee at almost every session, and I am sure no committee ever went into a subject more thoroughly, more painstakingly, and more patiently than did the Committee on Military Affairs on this subject.

It is not my purpose to make an extended talk on this legislation this afternoon, because the matter has been very thoroughly discussed by preceding speakers. I do want to say, however, that in my opinion any acquisition of strategic materials under the provisions of this bill will be just as valuable to this Nation, or perhaps more valuable, than the acquisition of so much useless gold. After all, while it is almost universally recognized in this world that gold is necessary, as a basis of currency, at the same time when we come to making a practical use of gold, about its only practical use, as far as I can see, is what you can use to fill your teeth. If we accumulate reserves of these essential materials without which the industries of this Nation cannot function, either in time of peace or in time of war, we have added to the resources, the assets, and the wealth of the Federal Government something which may be more valuable to us some day than all the gold buried at Fort Knox.

It does not necessarily follow that we contemplate using these materials in war time, as far as their use in lethal weapons is concerned, but it is highly probable that the day may come when the world will be so torn with strife that it will be impossible for us to secure enough of these essential commodities to enable our industries to function even though we may not be engaged in any hostility ourselves.

To illustrate: We are the largest consumer of tin in the world. Each year we consume in the neighborhood of 60,000 tons of pig tin—that is, refined tin, virgin tin. Every pound of this tin comes from abroad. The largest percentage of it comes from the Malay Straits Settlements. Some of it comes from Bolivia. We do not at the present time in the United States have one single smelter that could smelt tin ore, could we acquire the tin ore. We are the largest consumer of manganese in the world and annually consume in normal times in the neighborhood of 1,000,000 tons of ferromanganese. Without manganese our steel industries could not function. We are also the world's largest consumer of chromium and tungsten. Without these materials our steel industry could not function. Prior to this time we have imported practically all of our chromium and tungsten as well as our manganese.

I do not desire this afternoon to go into the likelihood of our being able to produce manganese domestically. In this connection I desire to say only that so far we have never done so, and by the testimony of the most optimistic supporters of a domestic manganese industry it has been proven before the Committee on Military Affairs that with the very best that they could do it would take 8 years before domestic producers could produce our annual needs of manganese. I would like to see the day come when we would be self-sufficient in manganese, and, indeed, self-sufficient in every commodity which we need in this Nation. That is, however, a physical impossibility.

There are many other commodities which may be acquired under the terms of this legislation, and it will be noted that no commodity is mentioned by name in the pending legislation. It is flexible enough to meet the varying conditions which we may encounter.

The first legislation introduced and reported along this line mentioned four commodities by name and it only proposed to acquire these four commodities. They were manganese, tin, chromium, and tungsten. But as more work was done on the legislation and more thought given to it, it was realized that conditions change so rapidly now that what is a very essential commodity today may not be so essential tomorrow, while a commodity which today is relatively unimportant may be a No. 1 essential commodity tomorrow. For instance, I do not doubt that a great many Members of the House are acquainted with this new metal beryllium and the rapid advances which will in all probability be made by that metal in the next few years. I use that simply as an illustration. There are various commodities which it will be necessary to acquire under the terms of this legislation that are highly perishable. These commodities are not metals. Manganese, tin, and various other metals could scarcely be classed as perishable, but there are certain drugs that are highly essential to this Nation which are highly perishable as is also rubber. There is not only a possibility but the certainty that these cannot be stored for any great length of time.

In order that the War Department may not lose the money invested in those commodities which are perishable, the rotation feature is provided in this legislation. The Procurement Division may turn these commodities into the market before they deteriorate and become useless. However, when they turn these commodities into the market, they must acquire others to replace the commodities so turned off in order that at all times a sufficient supply of commodities will be maintained in the Nation. They cannot speculate in commodities.

Just a word as to the appropriation asked for in the provisions of this legislation. We are asking for $100,000,000. I do not believe there is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs who believes that this sum is exorbitant. I know there are some of my colleagues on the minority side who do not wish to oppose the President in the matter of this appropriation. Just the same, I know that they firmly believe that in order to make ourselves safe along this line, a greater expense than this is justified.

I feel that the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House is to recommend to the Congress legislation which it deems sufficient to provide for the national security of the United States. I feel further that when we have recommended to the Congress legislation that we believe to be sufficient along this line, we have discharged our duty to the Congress and to the Nation. If the Committee on Appropriations or any other department in connection with the Government does not see fit to take the advice of the committee which is charged with this duty, then the committee has fulfilled its obligations to the Nation and has done all it can do.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take any more time. If any Member has any questions he would like to ask, I will be glad to endeavor to answer them.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he noticed about a month ago where the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation had sold to both Germany and Japan wheat for around 37 cents and 38½ cents a bushel, whereas the American consumer has to pay 70 cents a bushel in Chicago? If we are going to swap or trade our surplus wheat and cotton to Britain, Belgium, or any other country for tin and rubber, I trust that those who negotiate the trade will know how to swap horses a little better than we have been doing in the past.

Mr. FADDIS. I hope that will be the case. May I observe in that connection that the American individually is the sharpest trader the world has ever produced, but, taking us collectively, we seem to have been at the head of the world's sucker list of the past 25 years. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHORT. I heartily concur in the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

DEVELOPMENT OF DOMESTIC RESERVES MEANS DOUBLING OUR DEFENSE IN MATERIALS

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, in being accorded the privilege by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS], ranking minority member of the Committee on Military Affairs, to conclude the discussion on this side of the aisle, I, as a Member of the House, want to pay my respects to him, to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], chairman of the committee, and to the members of the committee. They have all been courteous and helpful to all of us lay Members who have consulted them on this bill. It was my privilege to appear before that committee in its consideration of this strategic-minerals bill. May I say to those Members who have not had occasion to appear before the committee that you will find on the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives men who are sincerely and earnestly interested in the welfare of the United States. [Applause.] They are exceeded by none in their patriotism and devotion to the best interests of this country.

As I stated, it was my privilege to appear before that committee on behalf of the proposal that the principle of the Buy American Act be incorporated in this legislation. The chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member were very sympathetic. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLASON] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MARTIN] were very helpful in framing a suitable amendment.

There are many Members of the House now before me, not members of the committee, who have been active and effective in developing support for the proposal. I see three or four in the front row, outstandingly, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON], the gentlemen from Montana [Mr. THORKELSON and Mr. O'CONNOR], and others who have spoken during the day. My colleague from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] has been greatly interested in the matter. These men have all been working for the development of a national-defense bill that will give us a double national defense, an emergency stock pile, and the double defense that comes from the development of our own resources.

I hold in my hand copy of a pamphlet prepared by the Committee on Industrial Preparedness, of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers published in 1933 entitled "Manganese for National Defense."

INSURANCE IS THE KEYNOTE

I want to call attention to a few sentences appearing on page 34 thereof. I quote:

> No one can foretell what the nature of the war emergency may be. It may range from an airtight blockade on the one hand, through numerous conceivable intermediate situations, to minimum interference with sea-lanes and shipping on the other hand. For this reason the availability of foreign imports necessarily remains an unknown quantity in our problem. Nor is there any way to determine it. At best, foreign imports cannot be classed as insurance, and insurance is the keynote of this discussion.

Let me repeat that—

> At best, foreign imports cannot be classed as insurance, and insurance is the keynote of this discussion.

That conclusion of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers is the sound basis upon which the Members of this House have asked that this program not only provide for the stock-piling of strategic materials but also permit and encourage the development of a domestic supply.

Reference has been made, I believe by the gentleman from Iowa, to the fact that there are four principal minerals in which we have a critical deficiency: Manganese, chromium, tungsten, and tin. It is true that with respect to chromium, tungsten, and tin there is as yet a lesser amount of evidence as to adequate supplies in this country, although I am reminded by the correspondence which comes to me frequently from my people in the mineral section of the Black Hills of South Dakota that we do have chromium, that we do have tungsten, and that we do have tin.

TIN IN THE BLACK HILLS

As a matter of fact, the Bureau of Mines' reports annually call attention to the deposits of tin in the Black Hills. Over a period of years considerable tin has been produced and two companies are milling ore there at the present time. Last year a party of four engineers from the Bureau of Mines spent several weeks investigating these tin deposits and two reports from the Bureau are now in preparation and are expected in May.

I am not contending that on the basis of present investigations or data available there is evidence to show that we have a supply of tin in this country adequate for any prolonged emergency, but at least we do have deposits that warrant a complete exploration to determine if we have enough tin to carry us through an emergency. Such tin as can be produced should be bought under the Buy American amendment to this bill in order to encourage full exploration of the deposits and research proposed in the bill should be carried on in such areas as this.

MANGANESE IS NO. 1 IN IMPORTANCE

A great deal of the discussion this afternoon has been addressed to the subject of manganese, and very properly so. I believe you all saw the statement of Mr. Girdler, of the Republic Steel Corporation, made in February of this year, that the time would come when the United States would give all the gold in the vaults in Kentucky for a pile of desperately needed manganese and chromium. It needs no emphasis from me to supplement what has been said earlier this afternoon about the importance of manganese generally. We must have it if we are to have steel in war or peace. I wish to concentrate my remarks on the domestic possibilities.

Bernard Baruch, who was Chairman of the War Industries Board during the World War, in December of 1919 in a letter to President Wilson stated:

> Through a system of stimulation by a protective tariff, a bonus, an exemption from taxation for a limited period, licensing, or any other effective means, every possible effort should be made to develop production of manganese, chrome, tungsten, dyestuff, by-products of coal, and all such raw materials usually imported but which can be produced in quantity in this country.

It is stated by the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, in the report to which I have already referred, that their earlier conclusions, published in 1924, have been modified as a result of two things: First, the development of new processes, and second, the discovery of new deposits of manganese in the United States.

THE SOUTH DAKOTA DEPOSIT

The deposit of manganese in South Dakota to which reference has been made so many times this afternoon was not known, as far as Bureau of Mines reports or United States Geological Survey reports are concerned, until 1929, and the first memorandum prepared and issued by the Department of the Interior was in February of 1930.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. The deposits were found by a prospector.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; I believe they were found by prospectors who knew what they were after. The Indians and early settlers spoke of them as the "black buttes."

The American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers in its 1933 report further says:

There is a way to possible modification of this war-reserve requirement. We have referred in the foregoing pages to recent discoveries of large reserves of low-grade material, of which the Chamberlain nodules are perhaps outstanding.

The report goes on to a properly conservative engineering statement:

We feel that processes might be developed, applicable to the large low-grade reserves, which would be noncommercial in normal times, but which might be thoroughly demonstrated to be technically sound and therefore applicable in times of stress and resulting high prices, such as in a war emergency. The investigation of such processes and their demonstration on an operating scale is obviously not an undertaking for private enterprise. But its importance to national defense is unquestionable.

Therefore, we go further than we did in 1924 with respect to supplementary recommendations, such as stimulating research and maintaining contact. We definitely recommend concrete research by the proper Government agencies, to the end that fully demonstrated methods supported by detailed designs and plans may actually be in hand on the eve of a war emergency.

On the basis of that recommendation, direct Government exploration and development of these reserves is warranted. You will recall that only a few weeks ago Congress passed legislation to authorize "educational orders" for factories and industries.

BILL PROVIDES EXPLORATORY WORK

It is interesting to me that the bill in one section provides authorization for an appropriation to the Bureau of Mines to do actual exploration work that can involve diamond drilling or crosscutting and development of processes to make a practical determination of the value of domestic deposits.

In the press memorandum put out by the Interior Department in February 1930, with respect to this Chamberlain deposit, it was stated that the exploratory work of the United States Geological Survey had been confined to nine townships. It further stated that the reconnaisance work by the principal operator and the United States Geological Survey had shown that the manganiferous zone persisted many miles farther up and down the valley of the Missouri River. In those nine townships they found by examining the bluffs and by digging pits and piling stocks a total estimated reserve of 102,177,476 tons, not of ore but of metallic manganese. This estimate is supported by a detailed table showing the estimates according to the different sections and legal descriptions of the land.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. This discovery doubled the known manganese reserves of this country. Up to that time the total manganese reserves of the country were estimated at 100,000,000 tons of metallic manganese.

I have here a letter from Donald M. Liddell, a well-known chemical engineer and metallurgist in the United States. This letter is dated September 9, 1938, and in it Mr. Liddell states with respect to the South Dakota deposits:

There is no question that it is possible to produce manganese oxide of high grade from these ores. * * *

In consideration of the importance of manganese from the standpoint of national defense, I have often wondered why the War Department was never given an appropriation to test the process for treating these Chamberlain ores. * * *

At worst, if it was found that the cost was so high as to make the process noncommercial, the War Department would at least have the information necessary for the prompt erection and operation of a plant in case of an emergency.

I may add that the General Manganese Corporation, which has been the principal prospector in this area, is confident that the processes it has developed will produce a concentrated manganese that will meet every demand—if, as a new producer, they can be given assurance of a steady and dependable market at a fair American price.

In conclusion, I merely wish to say that I am in favor of this proposed legislation. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the bill should be passed with the amount in the bill as it is. The Committee on Appropriations can be counted upon to reduce the appropriation if it is found that the failure of an emergency to develop means that the appropriation of less money is called for. However, speaking personally as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I wish to assure you of my support for a proper appropriation under the authorization herein granted.

In my remarks on April 12 I reported that Members of the House who were interested in the domestic development as a means of doubling the defensive values of this measure had agreed on the following amendment:

Page 4, line 16, strike out the period and insert "And provided further, That purchases under this act shall be made in accordance with the Buy American Act of March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1520), but a reasonable time, not to exceed 1 year, shall be allowed for production and delivery from domestic sources, and in the case of any such material available in the United States, but which has not been developed commercially, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may direct the purchase of such material without requiring the vendor to give bond; but nothing herein shall eliminate the requirement that the material delivered shall meet the specifications on which the order was placed."

Since then members of the group have conferred with members of the Military Affairs Committee and with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], whose name is carried on the bill and who has worked hard for many years for legislation of this character. It has been agreed that the first part of the amendment, that proposing the application of the Buy American Act, will be accepted, so that the amendment will read:

And provided further, That purchases under this act shall be made in accordance with the Buy American Act of March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1520), and a reasonable time, in the judgment of the Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy shall be allowed for production and delivery from domestic sources.

I am pleased that the committee has announced it will accept the amendment in that form, incorporating the principle of "buy American," in order that we may have first a stock pile and second the double defense that comes from the development and the encouragement of the development of our American deposits. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on the pending bill today may have permission to revise and extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remainder of the time allotted to this side.

Mr. Chairman, I do not suspect there is anybody here who imagines by any stretch of the imagination that I am going to take the 25 minutes that has been allotted to me. I would not have spoken upon the bill at all but for the fact that I very much desire to express my appreciation of the fine statesmanship, and sportsmanship as well, displayed by both sides of the House in the debate on this measure. It makes me very happy to realize that in all of these matters of national defense this body always exhibits its patriotism.

In the very few words I shall have to say about the matter, I simply want to stress two or three points. One is that this is both a national-defense measure and a recovery measure. It is a national-defense measure in the sense that it proposes to make this country self-sufficient in the matter of these strategic raw materials in case of war or any other great national emergency. It is a recovery measure in the sense that it proposes to encourage development of our own domestic resources in the production of these raw materials. If the spirit of the proposed bill is observed by those who administer it, it means development of our domestic mines and payment of wages to our own people, rather than people of other countries.

I am pleased to say on my own account that I greatly favor any measure that tends to develop domestic resources, that will spend money in this country for wages to provide greater comforts and greater conveniences for our own people, rather than spend it abroad among people to whom we owe no obligations in the way of support or relief.

I want to emphasize one other thing, and that is that it has been admitted here by everybody who has spoken upon the bill that during the last great war American producers were able to, and did, produce about 30 to 35 percent of our requirements, and basing my remarks largely upon a memorable statement made by one great statesman many years ago, that he had but one light by which his footsteps were guided and that was the lamp of experience, and taking that as my lesson today, I just want to call attention to the fact that during the World War when there was a market and a demand for manganese—and, of course, that is the critical No. 1 material—our production rose in this country, from domestic sources, from a little more than 6,000 tons to more than 300,000 tons.

Basing my remarks upon that experience and that accomplishment by an industry that had not then the facilities or the advantages of the new discoveries and the new research accomplishments we have now, I think I am perfectly safe in saying that in the event we had another war, this country would soon put itself in position to provide for our needs.

Now, I am hopeful that most of the war scare is over, and while it might not be over and they may have some war in Europe, I am not convinced yet that we are going to be involved in any war for many years, but I am also convinced that if we will begin, in good faith under the terms of this bill, to provide the necessary stocks or storage piles of these strategic materials, we can do this in peacetimes greatly cheaper than we can do it in wartimes, and that we can do it in peacetime by placing with those who have discovered deposits of manganese or tin or tungsten or chrome, if they discover them, and I know they have been discovered, according to Bureau of Mines reports, in about 27 States in this country—by placing trial orders contingent upon the production of the material and the furnishing of it—not advancing money or anything else of that kind, but saying to the producer, "When you produce so many tons of material, we will take it from you at a price." This will encourage the development of these resources of ours.

What the ordinary businessman wants is not a boost in prices for a small amount of production. What he wants is a long-time contract upon which he can be assured that he will have a market for his product in the event he finds it and produces it. In other words, the Government does not have to assume a single risk in the matter of domestic purchases of these strategic raw materials. What they should do and no doubt will do is to place orders for their needs at such prices as they are willing to pay and the producer is willing to take, and then the producer simply takes his Government order to his banker and on that order and the faith of the banker in his customer and his Government, he advances to the businessman the money necessary for working capital and production costs, and the producer then retires his loan from profits made. In that way the private banker furnishes the money for development and the Government pays for what it gets and nothing more. Therefore, I think that the matter of trial orders which this bill would authorize, if adhered to by those who administer it in the spirit in which the Congress intended it, will be a great boon to the production of domestic materials of this kind.

One thing on the question of the amount of money authorized by this bill, and I feel that it is unnecessary to discuss it because the bill will pass with the provision in it, but that is merely this: We do not know whether war will begin tomorrow or next day or 6 months or next month or this year or next year. It may be that the War Department and the Navy Department will need more money 3 years from now than they need this year. It might be that they will need more money next year than 4 years from now, and I think our committee has wisely provided for a lump-sum authorization in the maximum amount of $100,000,000, and that the House Committee on Appropriations and the President, through the Director of the Budget, will be able to control the situation, and instead of having too much money one year and not enough another year we will have the proper amount, and if an amendment should be offered I think it would be wise to leave it as it is.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes, gladly.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I was going to point out the very thing that the gentleman has mentioned, and also point out if the amount were reduced and 2 years from now it is found that we should make a larger purchase, the hands of the Appropriations Committee and the President would be tied.

Mr. MAY. That is correct, and time can only tell what the requirement will be, and the Committee on Appropriations will have ample latitude to provide what we need when we need it.

Mr. DONDERO. Over how long a period is it expected that this amount will be sufficient?

Mr. MAY. If we have any war at all we are liable to have it within the next 4 years, and the bill will provide for an amendment which the committee will offer for the use of this material within a period of 4 years, beginning with the 30th of June 1939, and ending with the fiscal year 1943.

Mr. DONDERO. Four years then.

Mr. MAY. Four years is the time. One other thing, and I am through. I want to say this to the minority side of our committee. Of course, they are all Republicans, and on the other side they are all Democrats. I suppose they are not to be blamed for being Republicans, and we are not to be charged with blame for being Democrats. But at no time since I have been chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs have I ever discovered the slightest effort on the part of any one of the minority to obstruct the proper procedure of the committee. They are helpful and cheerful under all circumstances; and since the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT], the orator of the Ozarks, had occasion to say some very flattering things about me, I say in reply that when we are in committee, and when we get into a little trouble, he always turns up as a ray of sunshine and gladness. He has always some happy joke that he can tell to get us off our troubles. He is always resourceful, so that on the one side I have my colleagues politically when I sit at the head of the committee, and I have a strong right arm, but I also have a strong left arm in the person of the minority members of my committee. I am happy to be here this afternoon for the finish of this bill, and I am delighted to close the debate with this statement.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time and ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the natural resources of the United States in certain strategic and critical materials being deficient or insufficiently developed to supply the industrial, military, and naval needs of the country, it is the policy of Congress and the purpose and intent of this act to provide for the acquisition of stocks of these materials and to encourage the development of mines and deposits of these materials within the United States, and hereby decrease and prevent wherever possible a dangerous and costly dependence of the United States upon foreign nations for supplies of these commodities in times of national emergency.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am moved to address the committee briefly today by reason of one statement contained on page 5 of the report of the bill, which reads as follows:

There is no domestic production of tin.

That is a broad statement, and unfortunately the committee was not well informed as to the domestic production of tin. There has been some domestic production of tin in the Territory of Alaska ever since about the year 1900, and by referring to the reports of the United States Geological Survey I find that the domestic production of metallic tin in Alaska in 1937 amounted to 166 long tons and in 1938 to 102 long tons. I have prospected in the Territory of Alaska for a great many years; and while I never spent any considerable time in the district that contains tin, I know there is a vast region in the Territory of Alaska more than 100 miles wide and approximately 800 miles long in which placer cassiterite, small portions of tin ore, can be found in some of the creeks within every 50 miles, and in some districts considerable quantity of this tin ore can be found mixed with gravel and other creek-bed material.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that every important mineral and metal discovery in Alaska has been made by prospectors?

Mr. DIMOND. Oh, yes; in fact, no discoveries are likely to be made otherwise.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. We have been told that Alaska is the great treasure house of the United States. I suppose the gentleman intends to speak of nickel and perhaps some of the other strategic metals.

Mr. DIMOND. We have good reason to believe that we may be able to develop enough nickel in Alaska to supply a large part of the needs of the Nation for nickel. That is a large order, but I make the statement after consideration. There is at least some probability that we have that much nickel in Alaska.

But what I wish to speak about is tin. Alaska is one place under our flag where there is at least more than a fair chance to develop an adequate national supply of tin. Let me repeat that there is an area in Alaska extending from Tin City on Bering Strait, 800 miles approximately eastward to the boundary of Canada, and tin ore can be found in the gravels of many of the creeks all along this region.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. The Foreign Affairs Committee of the House held exhaustive hearings several years ago on the subject of tin, making an investigation as to its production in this country, and also from whence it came, because of the fact that the United States consumes more than half the tin used in the world; yet we found no place in the United States where it was produced. Have there ever been made any tests of this tin in Alaska?

Mr. DIMOND. Yes. In the year 1937 Alaska produced about 166 long tons of metallic tin; in the year 1938 about 102 long tons. There is capacity for indefinite expansion of our production of tin in the Territory. The one thing that ought to be done by the Congress is to appropriate sufficient money to adequately explore the tin resources of Alaska. That is what I suggest now.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. I am firmly convinced that there are extensive deposits of cassiterite of tin in Alaska that could well be worth mining. I have been trying to get some people interested for the last 4 years in the matter, but I have been unable to do so. They claim it is too far away, and so forth. I agree with the gentleman. I believe there are valuable deposits there.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. J. W. Farrell, of Hot Springs, Alaska, who is extremely well informed on the subject, sent me some time ago a statement which he wrote concerning the occurrences of tin ore in the placers of Alaska from which I quote the following, believing that it is accurate and not an overstatement:

> The exploitation of tin on the Seward Peninsula has been carried on more or less since the beginning of the century. Reports of geologists and prospectors indicate that stream tin is dominant throughout the peninsula. In the Cape York, Port Clarence, and Kougarok mining districts tin has been found in commercial quantities and has been mined desultorily for the last 35 years. Repeated interruptions in its production have been caused solely on account of the market price. It is the old story again: We cannot compete with foreign products, with their cheap wages and low standard, unless we are subsidized or protected. It is in the York district where the most tin is mined. It is only those deposits of easy access and economically situated that can be made to pay under the existing conditions.
> Near Tin City in the Cape York district a dredge was operated for the recovery of tin alone. It has been in disuse now for many years, not because of the lack of tin ore to dig, for there are vast tracts of it, but the market price of the product did not justify continuing its operation. In this district tin has been found in the lode or bedrock source also. But owing to the great expense of exploration work on quartz prospects, especially on a metal of such low value, prospectors were not interested.
> RUBY-POORMAN AREA
> Eastward from the Seward Peninsula is the Ruby-Poorman mining district. Tin occurs in most all of the placer gold creeks in this camp. Only in a few instances has there been tentative shipments of tin to the market. There is, however, in this district many tributaries of the Sulatna River that throw more tin than gold, and the tin content is of sufficient quantities to be a prolonged producer if the price were right.
> Further eastward again is the Gold Hill mining district. Grant Creek and Mason Creek are said to contain large deposits. These two creeks will soon be in placer-gold production on a big scale. Whether it will justify the operators to save the tin it remains to be seen.
> HOT SPRINGS TIN
> Next comes the Hot Springs mining district. This camp and the Cape York district have been the greatest units in producing over a million dollars' worth of tin for the world's market. Please note, I say "world's market" for our big Nation has no market. In the Sullivan-Tofty area of this district placer-gold mining is being carried on of late with modern mechanical equipment. Last season this section was a big factor in the output of the Territory. Over tracts of placer ground that will be worked drill holes show that the tin content is more constant than the gold.
> The estimate of the tin values in this area run into the millions. Whether the operators will make any special effort to recover the tin or let it be swept away into the tailings is problematical.
> IN OTHER AREAS
> The cassiterite pebble occurs in the Rampart district, in the Tolovana and the Faith-Hope-and-Charity country. It is found in the Circle diggings and the Forty Mile country right up to the international border.
> Between the sixty-fourth and sixty-sixth parallels and from the border to Cape Prince of Wales, approximately 800 miles as the crow flies, embraces a vast area of territory that can really be called a "tin belt."
> There are many other localities outside of this belt that give great promise in potential tin resources. Among them are the Tolstoi, in the Ophir mining district; the Reglagalik River, in the Kuskokwim delta; and on Cache Creek and Willow Creek, tributaries of the Susitna River.

So, Mr. Chairman, I earnestly urge that for promotion of the aims of national defense—and national defense is the purpose of the bill now under consideration—the Congress would do well to appropriate at least $500,000 for the sole object of making a thorough, detailed, and scientific investigation of the tin resources of Alaska, for it may well be that Alaska alone can produce all of the tin needed by the Nation. In this connection it may be in order to observe that, so far as my knowledge goes, no tin ore has been found in place in Alaska, except, possibly, in slight quantities. The broken ore is found in relatively small particles or pebbles mixed with the stream gravels of the rivers and creeks in many parts of all of that vast region described by Mr. Farrell. Where so much broken and water-washed ore is found in the gravels it is highly probable that a search might reveal the source of the ore in the lodes. The amount of money required for a thorough prospecting of the region in which the principal tin occurrences are found is relatively insignificant. The possible beneficial results of such an examination are well-nigh incalculable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, naturally with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON], I welcome this addition to our tin information. I hope the distinguished Delegate from Alaska will amplify his statement and give to us his idea of what can be done in there.

May I say that I vouchsafe the hope that in dealing with these World War debts, those nations who have an opportunity to send those materials to us may remember the striking words of our President in his war-debt message of June 13, 1934, that those nations must make "substantial efforts" and "determined sacrifices" to pay us those debts; and that we were to view the use to which they utilize their national resources in paying. If they do that, I believe the American people will have a warmer respect for them, because the implications of that war-debt speech ought to be an illustration to those nations that owe us money. They can do something for us now, and now is the time to do it. [Applause.]

That may be the moral for foreign nations, but notwithstanding their final attitude, we must make the most of this great bill H. R. 5191, which has had the support of its sponsor, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Representative FADDIS, and the assistance of my own colleague from Connecticut, Representative JOSEPH J. SMITH, in its novel history. The contribution of the Military Affairs Committee in their studies and deductions on this subject—the acquisition and storage of strategic and critical materials to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for armed forces and the civilian population in time of national emergency—is an epochal one.

The committee on which I have the honor to serve has made an exhaustive kindred study into the supply of tin. The efforts of both of these committees means much for national defense.

It might be well to place in the record at this point a study on World Resources by Stuart Chase in his thoughtful and arresting book Rich Land, Poor Land:

If we had intelligence enough to maintain a world raw-material control, many of the reasons for modern wars would evaporate and concern about minerals would be greatly lessened. Each nation would know that it would receive its fair share of the available world supply. Meanwhile the United States and Russia have far more resources within their own boundaries than other nations have. The British Empire can almost match them, but the Empire depends on the navy and on long roads of transport. Brooks Emeny has identified 19 minerals and 3 agricultural products as of paramount importance in war. They are: Coal, iron ore, petroleum, copper, lead, nitrates, sulphur, bauxite zinc, manganese, nickel, chromite, tungsten, potash, phosphates, antimony, tin, mercury, mica, cotton, rubber, wool.

Let us note how well the seven great powers are supplied with these, including colonial possessions and regions of control, as well as home territory.

The United States is short of rubber and somewhat short of chromite, antimony, and tin.

Russia is short of rubber, antimony, tin, tungsten, and is not too well provided with nickel and bauxite.

Great Britain (including the Empire) is short of mercury, antimony, and potash, and needs more petroleum, sulphur, cotton, and phosphate.

Germany needs petroleum, copper, cotton, bauxite, rubber, manganese, nickel, chromite, tungsten, wool, phosphates, antimony, tin, mercury, mica, and some lead, sulphur, and zinc. Indeed, all she is sure of are coal, iron, nitrates, and potash. The reason for Hitler becomes plainer.

France requires petroleum, copper, cotton, zinc, rubber, tungsten, wool, tin, mercury, and some lead, sulphur, manganese, phosphate, and mica. She is sure only of coal, iron, nitrates, bauxite, nickel, chromite, potash, and antimony.

Italy is short of everything except iron, lead, nitrates, sulphur, bauxite, zinc, and mercury. She is totally without petroleum, cotton, rubber, nickel, chromite, tungsten, phosphate, tin, and mica. The Ethiopian adventure becomes plainer.

Japan is short of everything but coal, iron, copper, nitrates, sulphur, chromite, tungsten, and mica. She entirely lacks bauxite, rubber, nickel, and wool. The invasion of Mongolia and China is rationalized if not defended.

Japan has none of the 22 essentials to export; Italy has sulphur, zinc, and mercury; Russia petroleum, manganese, and tugsten; France, iron ore, bauxite, and phosphate; Great Britain, coal and nitrates; Germany, coal, nitrates, and potash. The United States exports coal, petroleum, copper, sulphur, cotton, zinc, and phosphates.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 2, strike out the word "hereby" and insert the word "thereby."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. To effectuate the policy set forth in section 1 hereof the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Interior, acting jointly through the agency of the Army and Navy Munitions Board, are hereby authorized and directed to determine which materials are strategic and critical under the provisions of this act and to determine the quality and quantities of such materials which shall be purchased within the amount of the appropriations authorized by this act. In determining the materials which are strategic and critical and the quality and quantities of same to be purchased the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, and Commerce shall each designate representatives to cooperate with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, when they deem such action appropriate, shall direct the Secretary of the Treasury, through the medium of the Procurement Division of his Department and from the funds authorized by the provisions of this act, to make purchases of such materials in accordance with specifications prepared by the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department and approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and to provide for the storage and maintenance and, where necessary, to prevent deterioration, for the rotation of such materials. To accomplish such rotation the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, is authorized to replace acquired stocks of any material subject to deterioration by equivalent quantities of the same material by such method as he may deem serves best the purposes of this act. The Secretary of the Treasury is empowered to meet, out of the funds authorized in this act, expenses necessary to accomplish this rotation. The commodities so purchased shall be stored by the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department on military and naval reservations or in other locations approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 4. Materials acquired under this act except for rotation to prevent deterioration shall be used only upon the order of the President in time of war, or when he shall find that a national emergency exists with respect to national defense as a consequence of the threat of war.

SEC. 5. For the procurement, transportation, maintenance, rotation, and storage of the materials to be acquired under this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $100,000,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, during the fiscal years from June 30, 1940, to and including June 30, 1943, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That any customs duties paid on such materials, imported from any place not included in the United States, as defined in section 401 (k) of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended by section 2 of the Customs Administration Act of 1938, shall not be covered into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States, but shall be credited by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be available for expenditure until the expiration of the then next fiscal year: And provided further, That materials purchased under this act and imported shall be entered at the customhouse in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MAY. I offer a further amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAY: On page 4, in line 2, strike out the word "from."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, that is merely a clarifying amendment in order to perfect the language of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, in line 3, strike out "1940" and insert "1939."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, that is merely an amendment providing for the beginning at the end of the present fiscal year, making this act effective.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment to the same section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAY: On page 4, line 16, strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "And provided further, That purchases under this act shall be made in accordance with the Buy American Act of March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1520), and a reasonable time, in the judgment of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, shall be allowed for production and delivery from domestic sources."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ALLEN of Illinois: Page 4, line 1, after the words "the sum of", strike out the remainder of line 1, all of lines 2, 3, 4, and 5, to and including the word "Navy", and insert in lieu thereof "not to exceed $10,000,000 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, 1941, 1942, and 1943, to be expended under the joint direction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy."

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I talked considerably on this measure earlier in the day and shall be brief in my remarks on it at this time.

President Roosevelt has publicly stated that in his opinion $10,000,000 would be sufficient to provide us this strategic and critical material. We do not need $100,000,000.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. PACE. Was not the President's statement to the effect that under the condition of the Budget and the Treasury $10,000,000 was all he could approve for the coming fiscal year? The gentleman can cite no instance in which the President has gone contrary to the recommendations of the War Department.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Has he recommended $100,000,000?

Mr. PACE. He has not recommended any amount; he has left that to the Congress.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Another body as well as the President recommended $10,000,000. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, we would do well to adopt this amendment and spend a portion of this $10,000,000 developing our own resources of these strategic materials in this country. This would be working in a sound and intelligent manner. We are continually hearing in this country about the superiority of German airplanes and their greater speed as compared with our Army planes. I think the United States Government has been derelict in not providing more research work. Each month we appropriate many millions of dollars to prepare our Army, our Navy, and our air force in order that we may be in better position in the event of war, but let us not lose sight of the fact that one of the best preparations for war is to have the finances of the country in sound condition. I would say that in the event this country should find it necessary to go to war now with a debt of $40,000,000,000, we would be under a handicap. I appeal, therefore, to the membership of the House, in addition to having a good army and a good navy, let us insist that we keep our Government finances in such condition that, should war come upon us, our country's credit will be unimpaired.

I ask and urge the adoption of this amendment, which, in my opinion—and, I believe, in the opinion of the administration and the Director of the Budget—will take care of the situation in an able manner.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is unnecessary to discuss this amendment at length. I merely referred to it in general debate this afternoon by saying that it was the judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs that $100,000,000 was the proper amount to be authorized in this legislation. This view is supported by the testimony of other witnesses from the War Department who appeared before the committee. There was no objection from any source to an authorization of $100,000,000; on the other hand, it was agreed by everyone that this was the appropriate figure.

The President's attitude toward the measure was simply this: He made no statement in writing to anyone, at least to my committee, and I receive all of the communications that come from the President to the committee. The only thing that happened in this regard was that he was quoted in the press as having said that $10,000,000 was about what the Government could afford during the next fiscal year in view of present fiscal affairs. Everyone understands, the gentleman offering the amendment understands, that the Bureau of the Budget through the House Committee on Appropriations will be able to control this section of the bill entirely, as to the amount of money that may be appropriated for any 1 of these 4 years.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. It is true, however, that the Bureau of the Budget did not render a favorable report to the committee on the $100,000,000 carried by the bill.

Mr. MAY. The Budget has made no recommendation about it, but the War Department has uniformly approved it.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, if we are going to legislate on this question, we must legislate effectively. In this as in anything else, if we are to buy anything worth while we must pay for it. If we are to accumulate a stock pile we cannot do so on a shoestring.

Our average annual consumption of tin in this country is 60,000 tons. There has scarcely been a time in the last 20 years when we have had 2 days' supply of tin in the warehouses in New York on any day. If foreign sources were to be shut off to us, so far as the tin we have on hand at any one time is concerned, the tinplate industry, the canning industry, and all other industries to which tin is an absolute necessity would have to cease. Soon the very wheels of industry would cease because of the lack of tin for bearings.

The cost of 60,000 tons of tin today at the average price of tin over the last 20 years would be $60,000,000. It is not contemplated under the terms of this bill to lay in a year's supply for we realize that would be impossible. To accumulate an average year's supply of manganese would cost in the neighborhood of $20,000,000. Anyone taking these figures into consideration, figures on these two essential commodities alone, would realize that the President never made any statement that $10,000,000 would be sufficient to supply these essential commodities in case of emergency.

The gentleman from Illinois, I am sure, spoke from a lack of information on the subject and probably from a lack of realization of the magnitude of the subject we are discussing today.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield? He referred to me.

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Was the gentleman from Illinois lacking in judgment when he said it is important for the financial condition of the country to be in good shape in the event we go to war?

Mr. FADDIS. No. Perhaps I should say the gentleman spoke from a lack of direct knowledge on the subject of the President's statement.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. How about direct knowledge on the fact that in order to go to war we should have our debt that we owe reduced down from $40,000,000,000? Does the gentleman agree with that?

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, it is the duty of the Congress, as I said once before, to pass legislation that it believes is sufficient to serve the country in time of need. No witness appeared before this committee in support of the legislation who believed that $10,000,000 would be anywhere near enough for this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, for the reasons stated, I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois be defeated.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BOLAND). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ALLEN of Illinois) there were—ayes 43, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. In the acquisition of stocks of materials, as herein authorized, the agency charged with the duty of acquiring the same shall, as to the materials acquired outside the United States—

(a) Request the appropriate department or departments to undertake the acquisition of the same from those nations which are indebted to the United States and which will consent to credit the agreed purchase price on the principal of such indebtedness; and

(b) Further request the appropriate department or departments to undertake the acquisition of the same from those nations which will consent to exchange such materials for surplus agricultural commodities produced in the United States: Provided, That the acquisition of such material shall not be delayed on account of the negotiations undertaken under paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts: On page 5, line 4, after the word "commodities", insert "or manufactures of agricultural commodities, or both."

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, there are provisions in this bill that irritate many of us when we think of the number of nations that owe us money and have never paid the debts they accumulated during the World War. They might at least pay their debts in part by giving us these raw materials. However, it is very apparent they are not being made to do that.

I sincerely hope the Members will vote for my amendment, which is a very simple one. It provides that manufactured articles made from our surplus agricultural commodities shall be exchanged for raw materials. We have today millions and millions of people unemployed. This amendment would give employment to those working in industries, such as cotton and woolen textiles, the boot, shoe, and other industries. It would also take up the surplus agricultural commodities.

I do not see how this amendment can be defeated when it would give so much employment to the people of our country. It would mean added purchasing power to the industrial workers, which would enable them to buy more farm products. It would take care of the surplus agricultural commodities and thus give work and money to people in the agricultural sections.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Would the gentlewoman have us provide in this bill for a method of acquisition of these manufactured commodities by the Government or their manufacture by the Government in order to obtain them for this barter?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do not see why the departments could not purchase them. This bill, in section 5, provides the sum of $100,000,000 for procurement, transportation, and so forth, to be acquired under this act. We could use the W. P. A., then refund the money to the W. P. A. That agency has already bought materials. There is a branch of the Treasury Department that buys certain surplus commodities, and I do not see why they could not buy manufactured products also. I think this could be easily arranged under existing law, temporarily at least, then, if necessary, have this bill changed later when the appropriation goes through.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. As a permanent policy for international trade, does not the gentlewoman believe we should have considerable more legislation than merely an amendment inserted in this military reserve bill, which is intended only to provide the war materials which we lack?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. It looks to me like a bill to sell cotton. Why not sell the manufactured articles also? I think our unemployment is an emergency and this is an emergency measure. I feel it ought to be inserted in the bill and I hope the Members will vote for it. Many of you have industries in your district which would be affected. The workers in industry will be given employment and you will be taking care of your surplus agricultural commodities as well. I cannot see why it is not an excellent amendment, and I earnestly hope it will be agreed to. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts may be reread by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the Rogers amendment.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Chairman, instead of this amendment having the effect of getting rid of a million bales of cotton, let us say, we would probably get rid of about 50,000 bales. As I stated the other day, the cotton farmer gets $40 for a bale of cotton. When it is manufactured into shirts it is worth from $1,000 to $2,000. The figures furnished me by the Department of Agriculture show that the finished product often sells for 25 times the price of the raw product. If the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts is agreed to, so far as cotton is concerned, we would get rid of only a handful of cotton.

In regard to wheat, I do not know what the lady proposes to do unless she proposed to make it into flour and then sell it in that form. I do not have the figures here, but I know the Department of Agriculture considers flour as in the same category as wheat, and under the recent subsidy flour was subsidized the same as was wheat. However, the main trouble is that the amendment is not practical because there is no fund available for the purchase of manufactured agricultural surpluses, but we do have a fund, fortunately, handled by the Surplus Commodities Corporation, to buy surplus agricultural commodities, but not surplus manufactured commodities.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Of course.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Why could not some of the $100,000,000 authorized by this bill be spent in buying manufactured materials? I do not see why this feature is not covered in the bill.

Mr. PACE. Of course, if we did that, we would not get very much material, if we had to spend most of the money in the manufacture of the commodity.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I believe the added employment in the industries would mean a great deal. The additional employment would mean added purchasing power also.

Mr. PACE. I appreciate the lady's interest in employment; but this is the situation with which we are now confronted: There are 32,000,000 farmers in this Nation. Last year their total income was about $8,000,000,000. There are approximately 40,000,000 wage earners in this country, and last year their total income was between thirty-five and forty billion dollars. Thus a third of the population is getting only $8,000,000,000 of income. Would not the lady consent for us to sell some of our commodities without burdening them by increasing the cost from 10 to 25 times in the course of manufacture?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman knows perfectly well that even when the farmers do not sell all their products they still have enough to eat, but when those living in the industrial sections do not have employment they do not have enough to eat and they lose their homes, which is not the case with the farmers. I want to help these workers. I am asking that you give the industrial workers in the mills and in the shoe industries a chance.

Mr. PACE. May I say to the good lady that she now has the protection of a very fine tariff wall and that that tariff is being paid by the farmers of this Nation.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I believe the gentleman forgets that many agricultural commodities also are protected.

Mr. PACE. No. We are told that if we increase the protection on our agricultural commodities we will get a veto. That is the situation which faces us.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. But you are already protected in certain commodities. I do not have the figures with me, but I know you have protection on many of your agricultural commodities.

Mr. PACE. We have a very small tariff on jute, and jute products today are displacing 2,300,000 bales of cotton. That is the kind of protection they give us in the agricultural sections.

The plan proposed by the pending amendment will increase the cost from 10 to 20 times, so I appeal to the lady, why not let the provision stand and let the exchange be made if it can be done? The lady knows no manufactured commodities are going to be exchanged.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. They could be perfectly well. For instance, Russia would be very glad to have our manufactured products.

Mr. PACE. I cannot debate that question with the lady because I do not know to what she is referring.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Russia would be glad to get clothing, and so forth. It seems to me it is only a question of justice. You shut our workers out of this bill and you help the farmers alone. I am only asking for justice for the workers.

Mr. PACE. I understand and appreciate the deep and active interest always shown by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts in the wage earners of her district, and she more than earns the splendid support they have given her through the years, but in this instance I believe they would realize a substantial benefit and more constant employment by unselfishly contributing toward an improvement of the economic condition of the 32,000,000 Americans who must depend upon the returns from agriculture for their income.

I, too, feel a very deep interest in the wage earners. I want to have some part in improving their standard of living and working conditions, but I know that we make no real progress when we try to aid one group or class at the expense of another group or class. On the contrary, I am convinced that our farm population is the best market for your manufactured goods. Around 90 percent of the manufactured articles sold in my district in Georgia are shipped from Massachusetts and the other industrial States of the East. Our work is on the farm. We have no plants to manufacture automobiles, refrigerators, radios, shoes, hats, pistols, guns, shells, and thousands and thousands of other articles found in every mercantile establishment in my State. The wage earners of the industrial States manufacture those articles and the income we receive for our cotton, peanuts, watermelons, peaches, and tobacco is all we have to buy with.

We now have nearly 17,000,000 bales of cotton on hand. Unless we can get rid of millions of bales, not merely thousands, we will not be able to sell our new crop this fall, and we will not be able to buy your manufactured goods.

Mr. Chairman, I urge that this amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to believe that the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] has made a very sound proposal, but I do not believe that it has the slightest chance of being adopted because it defeats the purpose of the bill. The purpose of the bill is to get rid of some of the surplus cotton. Under the New Deal the cotton States have been given the kiss of death. The price of cotton has gone down to 8½ cents, and we have lost half our cotton export trade. The Government now holds about 11,000,000 bales of cotton on which it has made loans, and very large sums are being paid for the storage of these bales of cotton. So the real purpose of the bill is to unload this cotton, and that is why they do not want the manufacturing interests of the North to come under this bill. The purpose of the bill is to unload the cotton of the South and the wheat of the West under the camouflage of exchange for war materials. The program of destruction and scarcity and plowing under of crops and birth control of pigs has, by establishing artificial prices, destroyed the foreign markets for our surplus wheat and cotton.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. For a very important question; yes.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Does the gentleman believe we should not unload the cotton, disregarding the fact that we have plowed some under?

Mr. FISH. I should be very glad to help the cotton people, as I have always said, but the only way I know of helping the cotton people is to elect a Republican President, and the quicker you do that the better. [Applause.] Unless you instill confidence in the people of this country, you will not have buying power and the cotton people will continue to go down and down and down. I want to remind you that before Mr. Hull brought in his free-trade hallucinations cotton under the Republican administrations from 1920 to 1930 sold at 17½ cents a pound.

Mr. BROOKS and Mr. THOMAS F. FORD rose.

Mr. FISH. I yield to one of the cotton experts of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BROOKS. I should like to ask the gentleman if he makes the statement that the fundamental purpose of this bill is to help the cotton farmers with the full knowledge that his colleagues on the Republican side of the committee supported the bill.

Mr. FISH. My Republican colleagues are just like me, they want to help the rest of the country, too.

We cannot have a prosperous country, we cannot have our people employed if there is no buying power in the South to buy what we produce up north. We are interested just as you are and we have to have a prosperous people if we are to have prosperity north, east, south and west.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. How are you going to have a prosperous country if you are going to oppose a measure that will dispose of a great share of the surplus cotton and wheat?

Mr. FISH. The only way is to stop putting it within the power of these New Deal wand wavers and magicians who have given the kiss of death to the cotton growers of the South——

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. That is nonsense, and you know it.

Mr. FISH. It is not nonsense, and you know it is not. It is just ordinary common sense and that is what the country needs. Cotton is selling at 8 cents or 8½ cents a pound, and if you think we can have a prosperous South with cotton selling at 8½ cents a pound and with 11,000,000 bales held by the Government, you know it is nonsense.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. That is just plain nonsense and nothing else.

Mr. KNUTSON and Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma rose.

Mr. FISH. It is economic suicide; and if that is nonsense, all right. I want to yield to my adviser on cotton from the State of Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. We can qualify all right. The gentleman from New York might have replied to the gentleman from California that we are not going to restore prosperity by continually giving the American market away to foreigners.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Here is another cotton man from Florida, and I would like to hear from him.

Mr. GREEN. In the last 2 years of President Hoover's administration we received 4 and 5 cents a pound for good lint cotton.

Mr. FISH. Well, that is tough, but only in the last year, when there was a world economic depression.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. That is too tough.

Mr. FISH. That is very tough, but that was only for 1932–33 when the banks were closed, but at the same time in the last 2 years that you mentioned we were shipping 9,000,000 bales of cotton abroad, and we retained the European and world markets on cotton. You have succeeded in losing half of that market, only selling 4,000,000 bales, and you have the price down now to 8½ cents, and where it will go I do not know. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN. It is 3 cents more than it was then, and 3 cents is better than nothing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior, through the Director of the Bureau of Mines and the Director of the Geological Survey, is hereby authorized and directed to make scientific, technologic, and economic investigations concerning the extent and mode of occurrence, the development, mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of ores and other mineral substances found in the United States or its Territories or insular possessions which are essential to the national defense or the industrial needs of the United States, and the quantities or grades of which are inadequate from known domestic sources, in order to determine and develop domestic sources of supply, to devise new methods for the treatment and utilization of lower-grade reserves, and to develop substitutes for such essential ores and mineral products; to explore and develop, on public lands and on privately owned lands, with the consent of the owner, deposits of such minerals, including core drilling, trenching, test-pitting, shaft sinking, drifting, crosscutting, sampling, and metallurgical investigations and tests as may be necessary to determine the extent and quality of such deposits, the most suitable methods of mining and beneficiating them, and the cost at which the minerals or metals may be produced.

For the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, 1941, 1942, and 1943, the sum of $500,000, of which amount $350,000 shall be appropriated to the Bureau of Mines and $150,000 to the Geological Survey.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURDOCK of Utah: Page 6, line 11, after the period, insert "There is also authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, the sum of $50,000, to be allotted to prospectors for prospecting the public lands for the strategic and critical materials under rules and regulations to be promulgated by the Bureau of Mines."

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I am speaking for the group of men this afternoon who have discovered, in my opinion, every important mineral or metal deposit in the United States, and that is the American prospector.

We are authorizing appropriations here today of $100,000,000 to buy strategic materials, most of which will go to foreign countries. Then we are authorizing the appropriation of $500,000 to be expended by the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey for the exploration and development of strategic materials on public lands and also on private lands. I am for this bill, now that it has been amended to encourage domestic development and production, and shall vote for it. But I make the statement, Mr. Chairman, that if and when additional deposits of these strategic metals or minerals are found withn the United States or found in Alaska, they will be found by the prospector.

The American prospector is a class that has never had any subsidy from the American Government. They are not eligible for any relief money that we have appropriated, either under P. W. A. or W. P. A., that is, to finance them in prospecting activities.

All my amendment would do is this. It would authorize $50,000 to be allotted to American prospectors to grubstake them, to enable them to go out into the unexplored portions of America and prospect for tin, tungsten, manganese, and other strategic metals or minerals in places which have never even been looked at yet. The Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey will carry out their functions as provided for in this bill in a very efficient and comprehensive manner, but if you find any new deposits you must depend on the American prospector to go out where no other man will go and find those new deposits. His business is prospecting the remote, inaccessible places, where others fear to tread.

Fifty thousand dollars, if appropriated to the American prospectors, would put 1,000 of them out into the field with a $50 grubstake, which is enough to maintain him out there for 3 or 4 months.

If you want to spend some money that will show results, you can make no better investment at this time than to allot the small sum of $50,000 to the American prospectors who want to go out and look for these minerals.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. We have heard it said that mines are made and not found. There is a lot of truth in that, but does the gentleman not believe that this fact has been overemphasized to the neglect of this other fact of mining, that mines first must be found before they can be made? Western mining indeed owes very much to our courageous prospectors who comb our hills for hidden wealth. More power to them.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. There never was a mine made that was not first found, and very few have been found by anyone other than the prospector.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Is it not true that the American prospector is the real American individual?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Yes; that is true.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. And if we give him an opportunity to develop this in a small way with his initiative, will it not be true that he will develop more for $1 than the average corporation would for $50?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. That is very true. If you give him a grubstake and a jackass, he will find more strategic minerals, in my opinion, than any other group in the United States.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. And for that reason I believe the gentleman has the best amendment that has been offered on the floor this afternoon.

Mr. KNUTSON. And in view of what the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS F. FORD] has said that the prospector is the real American, does not the gentleman believe that we should leave one segment of our citizenship unspoiled?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I do not say that he is the only true American, but I do say that he is the type of American who will go out on his own and prospect for these things, and the $50,000 that my amendment would authorize would certainly be a step in the right direction.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK] has just made a very significant statement. He asked for an opportunity for the prospector to go out and develop essential minerals for the United States. I know those old prospectors. I know what they do. They go out and work for years and years and years. Some of them never get any place, but about 10 percent come in with a claim or discovery that enriches the United States millions and millions of dollars in the end, and it is my opinion that any appropriation that we make or any concession that we give them is worth 100 times what we expend. For that reason I hope that the Members of the House will support the amendment of the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah. In the western part of the United States there are vast areas covered more or less with lava flow underneath which there probably lie, undoubtedly do lie, large deposits of valuable minerals. At this time they are practically unprospected because of the lack of grubstaking—the lack of an agency that would support the prospector in the field. If this is done, I assure the Members of the House that there is a virgin territory and literally hundreds of thousands of square miles where comparatively little prospecting has been done, and with the aid of modern equipment and scientific knowledge of these domestic strategic materials you are likely to be many times repaid for the investment made.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. And is it not a fact that $50 to grubstake the prospector for 2 or 3 months would be a much cheaper way of keeping him than on relief?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Absolutely.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I do not wish to take issue with the able gentlemen from the mining communities, but I happen to have had a little experience with prospectors, as probably many of you have had.

I know that in the mountains of southern California there are a great many prospectors who are living in cabins and holes in the wall out in the desert countries, and they are living largely on the grubstakes they have obtained from citizens in the cities. Out along the well known metropolitan aqueduct there are probably several thousand prospectors living in tents, cabins, and what not, who will go into the city of Los Angeles, for example, and sell rights or interests in whatever they might find. As a matter of fact, the metropolitan water district has discovered through 96 miles of 16-foot tunnel there are not 18 inches of mineral-bearing rock in the whole district; yet I will wager that much more than $50,000 a year is handed to these various prospectors out along this same mountain territory. A prospector financed by the Government, who locates a claim, is not likely to turn it over to the United States Government. If he cannot do anything else, he is likely to set a rock on it so that a friend of his can find it and himself lay out a claim. I do not see that there is any reason whatsoever for grubstaking prospectors when at the present time they have every opportunity in the world to go into the cities and get what money they need.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. The gentleman says that on that great metropolitan district aqueduct there has not been any metal discovered?

Mr. HINSHAW. Right.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. But the gentleman understands they have gone through only about five mountain chains?

Mr. HINSHAW. Ninety-six miles of crosscutting of the various veins in southern California.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. But do you know and are you willing to say that 2 or 3 or 4 percent of the prospectors who have discovered valuable claims have not produced wealth 10 times or 20 times in excess of the wealth that has been given to them as prospectors or as grubstakes?

Mr. HINSHAW. I would not say it was as high as 2 or 3 or 4 percent. I would say about one-half of 1 percent; and I would say the amount of wealth they have discovered was enormous, and if they did not keep it for themselves they sold it to somebody else for practically nothing.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. But it is more than 100 percent of the amount they put in.

Mr. HINSHAW. That might be true, but I do not see how the United States can recover a dime from this $50,000 proposed in this amendment.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. KITCHENS. About how many prospectors are there?

Mr. HINSHAW. I think several thousand of them.

Mr. KITCHENS. And I suppose this $50,000 would give each of them about 50 cents?

Mr. HINSHAW. About 50 cents each, and it would not amount to anything.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. I made this amount small for that specific purpose, but it would do this: If you would allot $50 each for a grubstake to 1,000 prospectors you would have that many men out in the hills. The answer to the gentleman on this relief proposition in this: When you force them to go into the cities and out of the hills and depend on relief, you destroy the very thing that we would do by this amendment. What I want to do is to give them a grubstake and get them back into the hills where they belong.

Mr. HINSHAW. I will say to the gentleman there is hardly a real prospector in the United States who cannot go into a big city and get anything he wants.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. The point is this: There are probably ten or fifteen thousand prospectors in the Western States.

Mr. HINSHAW. At least. I am a prospector, potentially.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. And 90 percent of them have been financed by individuals?

Mr. HINSHAW. Right.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. I will venture this prediction——

Mr. HINSHAW. And 98 percent of the individuals have been suckers to do it.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. I will venture this prediction, that they have produced more wealth in the way of minerals than all the money that they have invested, plus 100 percent.

Mr. HINSHAW. And who got the wealth? [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will now rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAYBURN] having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5191, pursuant to House Resolution No. 173, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of S. 572, to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for the armed forces and the civilian population in time of a national emergency, and to encourage, as far as possible, the further development of strategic and critical materials within the United States for common defense, a similar Senate bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the natural resources of the United States in certain strategic and critical materials being deficient or insufficiently developed to supply the industrial, military, and naval needs of the country for common defense, it is the policy of Congress and the purpose and intent of this act to provide for the acquisition of stocks of these materials, to encourage the further development of mines and deposits of these materials in the United States, and to decrease and prevent wherever possible a dangerous and costly dependence of the United States upon foreign nations for supplies of these materials in times of national emergency.

SEC. 2. To effectuate the policy set forth in section 1 hereof the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy acting jointly through the agency of the Army and Navy Munitions Board are hereby authorized and directed to determine which materials are strategic and critical under the provisions of this act and to determine the quality and quantities of such materials which shall be purchased within the amount of the appropriations authorized by this act. In determining the materials which are strategic and critical and the quality and quantities of same to be purchased the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, and Commerce shall each designate representatives to cooperate with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy when they deem such action appropriate because the domestic supply of any of the above materials is insufficient to meet the industrial, military, and naval needs of the country shall direct the Secretary of the Treasury through the medium of the Procurement Division of his Department, from the funds authorized in section 6 of this act, to make purchases of such materials in accordance with specifications prepared by the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department and approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and to provide for the storage and maintenance and, where necessary to prevent deterioration, for the rotation of such materials. To accomplish such rotation, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, is authorized to replace acquired stocks of any such material subject to deterioration by equivalent quantities of the same material in such manner as he deems will best serve the purposes of this act. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay the expenses necessary to accomplish such rotation out of the funds authorized in section 6 of this act. The Secretary shall include in his annual report to Congress a detailed statement of expenditures made under this section and the method of rotation employed. The commodities so purchased shall be stored by the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department on military and naval reservations or in other locations approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 4. Materials acquired under this act, except materials which must be rotated to prevent deterioration, shall be used only upon the order of the President in time of war, or when he shall find that a national emergency exists with respect to national defense as a consequence of the threat of war, or when he shall find and shall issue a proclamation that a state of emergency exists arising out of deficiencies in the supply of these commodities of such a character as to have a seriously adverse effect on the national defense, by unemployment, the closing of manufacturing plants and interruption in the supply of semimanufactured or manufactured commodities: Provided, That when the President finds that any material acquired under this act is not necessary to carry out the purposes of the act or that the quantity in possession is larger than is necessary, he may sell all or any part of such material. The proceeds of any such sale shall be allocated to and deposited in the fund herein provided for.

SEC. 5. Purchases under this act shall be made in accordance with title III of the act of March 3, 1933 (47 Stat. 1520), but a reasonable time (not to exceed 1 year) shall be allowed for production and delivery from domestic sources and in the case of any such material available in the United States but which has not been developed commercially, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may, if they find that the production of such material is economically feasible, direct the purchase of such material without requiring the vendor to give bond.

SEC. 6. For the procurement, transportation, maintenance, rotation, and storage of the materials to be acquired under this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $10,000,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, 1941, 1942, and 1943, to be expended under the joint direction of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 7. (a) That the Secretary of the Interior, through the Director of the Bureau of Mines and the Director of the Geological Survey, is hereby authorized and directed to make scientific, technologic, and economic investigations concerning the extent and mode of occurrence, the development, mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of ores and other mineral substances found in the United States or its Territories or insular possessions which are essential to the industrial needs of the United States for common defense, and the quantities or grades of which are inadequate from known domestic sources, in order to determine and develop domestic sources of supply, to devise new methods for the treatment and utilization of lower-grade reserves, and to develop substitutes for such essential ores and mineral products; to explore and develop, on public lands and on privately owned lands, with the consent of the owner, deposits of such minerals, including core drilling, trenching, test-pitting, shaft sinking, drifting, crosscutting, sampling, and metallurgical investigations and tests as may be necessary to determine the extent and quality of such deposits, the most suitable methods of mining and beneficiating them, and the cost at which such minerals or metals may be produced.

(b) For the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1940, 1941, 1942, and 1943, the sum of $500,000, of which amount $350,000 shall be appropriated to the Bureau of Mines and $150,000 to the Geological Survey.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAY: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the bill H. R. 5191, "To provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for armed forces and the civilian population in time of national emergency, and to encourage the development of these resources within the United States, and for other purposes," as amended in the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider and a similar House bill (H. R. 5191) to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for armed forces and the civilian population in time of national emergency, and to encourage the development of these resources within the United States, and for other purposes, were laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who participated in the debate on the bill H. R. 5191, the strategic and critical materials bill, may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

DETAIL OF CERTAIN UNITED STATES EMPLOYEES

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3134) to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the temporary detail of United States employees, possessing special qualifications, to governments of American republics and the Philippines, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1938, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the act entitled 'An act authorizing the temporary detail of United States employees, possessing special qualifications, to governments of American republics and the Philippines, and for other purposes', approved May 25, 1938, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

" 'That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized, whenever he finds that the public interest renders such a course advisable, upon agreement with the government of any other American republic or the Government of the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands, or the Government of Liberia, if such government is desirous of obtaining the services of a person having special scientific or other technical or professional qualifications, other than those persons covered by the act of May 19, 1926 (44 Stat. 565), as amended by the act of May 14, 1935 (49 Stat. 218), from time to time to detail for temporary service of not exceeding 1 year at a time, under such government, any such person in the employ of the Government of the United States: Provided, That the President may, in extraordinary circumstances, extend the period of such detail for one or more additional periods of not to exceed 6 months each: Provided further, That while so detailed, such person shall be considered, for the purpose of preserving his rights and privileges as such, an officer or employee of the Government of the United States and of the department or agency from which detailed and shall continue to receive therefrom compensation, and he may receive additional compensation from the department or agency from which detailed not to exceed 50 percent of the compensation he was receiving as an officer or emloyee of the United States at the time of detail, and shall receive from the United States reimbursement for travel expenses to and from the place of detail and monthly allowances determined by the President to be adequate for quarters and subsistence during the period of such detail. The additional compensation, travel expenses, and other allowances authorized by this act to be paid to any such officer or employee shall be paid from any appropriations available for the payment of compensation and travel expenses of the officers and employees of the department or agency from which he is detailed: Provided, however, That if any government to which a detail is authorized by this act shall express the desire to reimburse this Government in whole or in part for the expenses of such detail, the President is authorized, when he deems it in the public interest, to accept such reimbursement and the amount so received may be credited to (a) appropriations current at the time the expenses of such detail are to be or have been paid, (b) appropriations current at the time such amounts are received, or (c) in part as provided under (a) and in part as provided under (b) hereof; and such amount shall be available for the purposes of the appropriations to which credited: And provided further, That if any such government shall express the desire to provide advances of funds to be used by this Government, in whole or in part for the expenses of such detail, the President is authorized, when he deems it in the public interest, to accept such advances of funds, and the amounts so received may be established as a trust fund to be available for the purpose and under the provisions of this act until the termination of the detail; any unexpended balance of the trust fund to be returned to the foreign government making the advance.' "

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us the nature of the Senate amendment?

Mr. MAY. I do not have the Senate amendment before me, but it is of a clarifying nature. It includes the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] when the bill was under consideration in the House, and the House bill is not changed in any material manner.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

2725. Also, petition of Local No. 31, National Association of Post Office Mechanics, Oyster Bay, N. Y., urging support of House bill 892; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

2726. By Mr. KEOGH: Petition of the American Trucking Association, Inc., Washington, D. C., concerning Senate bill 2009, transportation bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

2727. Also, petition of the Dressmakers Union of New York City, concerning House bill 210, the Celler bill; House bill 4369, the Lesinski bill; and House bill 3215, the McCormack bill; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

2728. Also, petition of the Dressmakers Union, New York City, opposing the Hobbs bill (H. R. 5643); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2729. Also, petition of the Transport Workers Union of America, Michael J. Quill, president, New York City, favoring the passage of House bill 2888, providing for additional appropriation of $800,000,000 to the United States Housing Authority for slum clearance and decent housing; to the Committee on Appropriations.

2730. By Mr. LEAVY: Petition of the Sportsmen's Association of Pateros, Okanogan County, Wash., urging that, in the contemplated reorganization of Government agencies, the national forests, Federal grazing ranges, migratory fowl and small bird protection and conservation programs, water pollution, and other kindred matters all be administered by a Department of Conservation, unhampered by the care of unrelated affairs; to the Select Committee on Government Organization.

2731. By Mr. LEWIS of Ohio: Petition of 27 elders and ministers of the St. Clairsville presbytery of the Eighteenth Congressional District of Ohio, protesting against the sale by the United States of such materials as cotton, oil, iron, and finished products to Japan to aid them in their aggression against China; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

2732. By Mr. MAGNUSON: Petition of the Washington Temperance Association of Seattle, Wash., submitted by W. J. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., pastor of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Spirit, high over us all, yet deep within us all, we stand in reverence before Thee as together we face the tasks of this day. Help us to whom the torch of great traditions has been passed to serve the present age and to be loyal to the royal in ourselves. Disarm our minds of prejudice, suspicion, fear, and hatred. May our attitude to Thy other children of any race or nation not add to the poison which threatens the peace and happiness of our common humanity. Above all other loyalties and fealties may our ruling passion be to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly before our God.

We lift before Thee the sacred interests of our Republic. We beseech Thee for high hearts and wise minds. Through all the maddening maze of these troubled times that are trying men's souls may we not be disobedient to the heavenly vision.

And now in this shrine of each patriot's devotion may we be still and know that Thou art God; that Thou wilt be exalted among the nations; Thy kingdom come and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. We ask it in the ever-blessed Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of the House was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 5287. An act relating to the importation of distilled spirits for consumption at the New York World's Fair, 1939, and the Golden Gate International Exposition of 1939, and to duties on certain articles to be exhibited at the New York World's Fair, 1939.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 527. An act for the relief of J. J. Greenleaf;

S. 765. An act for the relief of Hugh McGuire;

S. 920. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the District of Montana to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of the estate of Joseph Mihelich;

S. 927. An act to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Suncrest Orchards, Inc.;

S. 1092. An act for the relief of Sigvard C. Foro;

S. 1160. An act for the relief of Roland Hanson, a minor, and Dr. E. A. Julien;

S. 1372. An act for the relief of W. B. Tucker, Helen W. Tucker, Lonie Meadows, and Susie Meadows;

S. 1448. An act for the relief of Anna H. Rosa;

S. 1812. An act for the relief of A. E. Bostrom;

S. 2126. An act authorizing the Comptroller General of the United States to adjust and settle the claim of E. Devlin, Inc.; and

S. J. Res. 11. Joint resolution directing the Comptroller General to readjust the account between the United States and the State of Vermont.

IMPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS FOR CONSUMPTION AND DUTIES ON CERTAIN ARTICLES TO BE EXHIBITED AT THE NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR, 1939

Mr. CULLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 5287) relating to the importation of distilled spirits for consumption at the New York World's Fair, 1939, and the Golden Gate International Exposition of 1939, and to duties on certain articles to be exhibited at the New York World's Fair, 1939, with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out all after "of" over to and including "spirits", in line 3, page 2, and insert "section 2871 of the Internal Revenue Code."

Page 5, strike out lines 20 to 23, inclusive, and insert:

"SEC. 4. Tourist literature containing scenic, historical, geographic, timetable, travel, hotel, or similar information, chiefly with respect to places or travel facilities outside the continental United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York explain the Senate amendments?

Mr. CULLEN. Surely.

The first amendment is merely a technical amendment making reference to the Internal Revenue Code instead of to the joint resolution.

The second amendment rewrites part of section 4 and restricts the importation of books, pamphlets, and literature to scenic, historical, geographic, timetable, travel, hotel, or similar information. I believe this strengthens section 4 and will have the effect of keeping out a lot of literature that may be brought in from abroad in the nature of propaganda.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is this agreeable to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], a member of the gentleman's committee?

Mr. CULLEN. I spoke to the gentleman and he agreed to it.

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the world's fair that is to be opened on Sunday, I understand a special train will leave Washington this week end to take to the world's fair all Members of Congress and their wives who desire to go. That is fine; but may I ask the gentleman if there will be any obligation on our part, if we take that train ride to New York, to vote later for the additional $3,000,000 that is desired?

Mr. CULLEN. None whatever.

Mr. RICH. We can have the free ride?

Mr. CULLEN. You can have the free ride and enjoy the company and your presence at the fair.

Mr. RICH. That will be fine; and we will meet Grover Whalen?

Mr. CULLEN. Yes; and you will be under no obligation whatever with relation to voting for the $3,000,000.

Mr. RICH. That is fine.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his reservation of objection?

Mr. RICH. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HESS and Mr. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY were given permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

PROMOTION OF OFFICERS OF THE NAVY

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 170 and ask its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 170

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 4929, a bill to amend the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 944). That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bills and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] desire to yield time under the rule?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, there is no opposition to the rule. I understand the minority members have an amendment they desire to propose or discuss in connection with the bill itself.

Mr. SABATH. They will not be foreclosed from offering any amendment, because this is a broad and liberal rule, as is usually reported by the Rules Committee.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1939

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees may have until midnight tonight to file a conference report on the second deficiency appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD by inserting therein a speech made at Lynchburg by the chairman of the Democratic National Committee on April 13 and an introduction by the senior Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman says this speech was made by the Democratic national chairman. Is that Mr. Farley, the Postmaster General?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is the gentleman.

Mr. RICH. Are these speeches of Mr. Farley's that we are printing all the time at Government expense for the welfare of the country or for the benefit of the Democratic Party?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I may say to the gentleman that whatever is for the benefit of the Democratic Party is for the good of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. That might be all right if the gentleman is speaking of Jeffersonian Democrats, but the gentleman who made the speech is a new dealer. Does the gentleman figure that the New Deal is a part of the Jeffersonian Democratic Party?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I believe the New Deal has done many things that have saved the country.

Mr. RICH. It is wrecking the country. If the gentleman will look at the financial statement of the Treasury, he will come to that conclusion, and I know the gentleman has realized it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his reservation of objection?

Mr. RICH. I will permit the speech to go in the RECORD this time, but I hope after this they will keep out of the RECORD a good many of the speeches by Mr. Farley, because he has more speeches printed in the RECORD than any other public official.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by Dr. H. G. Harmon, president of William Woods College.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. LUDLOW submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 4492) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes.

PROMOTION OF OFFICERS IN THE NAVY

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the bill H. R. 4929, a measure that has been unanimously reported by the Naval Affairs Committee. There is no opposition, as I understand, either to the bill or the rule.

All the bill aims to do is to provide for more orderly promotion in the Navy Department; and in view of the fact that the minority does not desire any time on the rule, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4929) to amend the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 944).

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4929, with Mr. JONES of Texas in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the object and purpose of the proposed bill is to iron out and remove inequities that have been found to exist in the selection law that was passed during the last session of Congress.

Experience has shown that in any personnel legislation of any magnitude not all provisions are perfect and produce the results desired. Therefore, the sole object and purpose of the proposed bill is to make certain changes to improve the act and to facilitate its operation and thereby be more equitable to the officer personnel of the Navy.

I shall briefly explain each and every one of the amendments so you can readily understand what is proposed and the reason why the changes are necessary.

The first two amendments relate to the composition of the selection board. Under the law today—that is, the Selection Act of June 23, 1938—the Secretary of the Navy designates a board of nine rear admirals to consider promotion of officers who are in the grade of lieutenant commander to the grade of commander. The law also prohibits a member from serving on two successive boards.

We proposed to change that by having a board consisting of three rear admirals and six captains. The reason why the change is proposed is in view of the fact that under the present law no member of a board can serve in successive years, and the Navy Department experienced difficulty in getting rear admirals who could serve on the boards because their duties scatter them all over the country, and it is costly to assemble them and also it interferes with their duties.

With six captains on the board, it places a majority of officers in rank nearer to that of lieutenant commander and who naturally will be in a better position to know of the actual performance of duty of the officers considered for promotion.

The other amendment prohibits the commander in chief of the fleet from serving on a selection board.

The presence of the commander in chief of the fleet on any selection board might tend to have, though unconsciously, an effect upon the decision of officers serving on the board.

There can be no doubt that these two amendments relating to the composition of the board will bring about much improvement in the selection law.

The next amendment relates to the "physical condition" and "medical records" of the officers to be considered by the selection board.

Under the law today the Secretary of the Navy submits to the selection board, first, the number of vacancies to be filled in each grade; second, the names of all officers eligible for consideration for promotion in each grade. No officer's name can be submitted for consideration by the selection board who is not physically qualified. Therefore you will observe that physical qualifications is one of the prerequisites before the selection board can consider an officer.

The amendment proposes to change that by making it unnecessary to have a physical examination before the officer's name is certified by the Secretary as eligible for consideration by the selection board.

This change is brought about by the administrative difficulties encountered when it comes time to certify to the board that the officer whose name is submitted for consideration is physically qualified.

In practice it is an impossibility to hold last-minute physical examinations on each of the 1,000 or more officers eligible annually for selection.

All officers of the Navy are given an annual physical examination and anyone who is found physically disqualified to perform all of his duties is automatically ordered before a retiring board if his disability is of a permanent nature. Again, an officer may be temporarily physically disqualified or may be on duty where examination cannot be arranged to determine his physical condition.

By the selection board's considering his medical record you can rest assured that no officer who is not physically qualified to perform his duties will be selected.

After an officer has been selected, before he is promoted, he must stand a physical examination.

The amendment simply puts the physical examination after he has been selected for promotion instead of making it a condition for consideration by the selection board.

The next amendment simply supplies language to continue the previous practice under the prior law in the selection of additional-number officers. Officers who are additional numbers in a grade are not counted in the total number authorized by law to be in that grade, and, for the same reason, should not, when selected, be counted in the number designated to be selected to fill the vacancies in the next higher grade. It was the intent that these additional-number officers should not be counted, but the interpretation of the law is that they do count, and the amendment proposed to the act will eliminate all doubt.

Forty-eight officers known as "aeronautical engineering duty only officers," 67 officers known as "engineering duty only officers," and 17 officers carried as extra numbers provided for by acts of Congress, making a total of 132 officers, are carried as extra or additional numbers in the service, and these additional number officers are not counted in the distribution of officers in the various grades as provided by law.

The sixth amendment combines subsection (d) and (e) of section 9 of the act of June 23, 1938.

Section (d) prohibits "aeronautical engineering duty only" officers from succeeding to command on shore. However, officers assigned to "engineering duty only" were permitted to succeed to command on shore.

The proposed amendment, by combining subsections (d) and (e), removes the restrictions against officers performing "aeronautical engineering duty only" by being permitted to command on shore. It permits them to be ordered to command on shore only when ordered to do so by the Secretary of the Navy.

It also provides that the recommendation of the selection boards in the cases of officers of this class shall be based upon their comparative fitness for the duties prescribed for them by law, the same provisions that are now applied to officers assigned to "engineering duty only."

In other words, it simply places officers assigned to "aeronautical engineering duty only" on the identical basis with officers assigned to "engineering duty only."

The next amendment relates to the decision of the selection board for promotion, retention, and so forth, being by a two-thirds vote.

As the bill passed the House last year, the selection boards had but two functions. They were to select officers as best fitted for promotion and to designate those adjudged as fitted for promotion.

Both of these functions require a two-thirds vote of the selection board. However, three more functions were added to the duties of the selection board by the final act. These are: First, choosing which of the officers adjudged fitted for promotion should be retained on the active list; second, designating unsatisfactory officers for discharge; and third, designating inapt lieutenants, junior grade, for revocation of commission. As there is no specific authority of law stating that these three additional functions of the selection board require a two-thirds vote, the Navy Department has ruled that the action of the selection board requires only a majority vote.

As these three functions are more or less punitive in nature, it is believed that all of the actions of the selection board should be by two-thirds vote, and that is what this bill will provide.

Under the act of June 23, 1938, there is no general retirement-pay clause in the act; nevertheless, reference is made to retired pay. To clear up the same it is necessary that some positive statement be made as to how retirement pay shall be computed, and therefore we are amending section 11 to take care of this situation, and the retired pay referred to in the selection law is the same as under the general law.

The next amendment deals with giving fitted officers not retained the same consideration as fitted officers retained.

Under the law today fitted officers that are designated by the President for retention when they retire receive the retired pay of their rank; however, officers who are classified by the selection board as fitted but not retained are retired with only the rank and not the retired pay of that rank.

This amendment restores to them the pay of the rank when retired as a fitted officer.

The next amendment, which provides:

Provided further, That until June 30, 1944, such officers shall not be retired until they shall have completed the periods of commissioned service prescribed for their respective grades in subsection (d) of this section for fitted officers recommended for retention on the active list—is the most important amendment in the bill. It is a committee amendment.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is aware of the fact that I have introduced a bill relating to certain staff officers. Is it the gentleman's intention to add any amendment of that kind to this bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The pending bill relates only to the line and not to the staff.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman is not going to put in an amendment to this bill calling for a survey of the staff officers?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I have not reached that phase in my remarks.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman intend to do that?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is under consideration.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the gentleman is not going to do that, it would be very convenient for me to know it, because I am for the bill, but if the gentleman intends to do that, I shall have to forego attending to some other important matters.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We trust the Committee will have the benefit of the presence of the gentleman during the consideration of the bill and that the gentleman will stay here.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman frankly advise me whether he intends to offer an amendment providing for such a survey?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Not right now.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman intend to do that in connection with the consideration of this bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I cannot answer that question now. I will talk to the gentleman after I have finished my remarks.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. Is there any provision in this bill in any way affecting any retired officer?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Not at all.

As I have stated, this is the most important amendment in the bill and it is a committee amendment.

Under the method of selection, the selection board designates the officers of each grade who are best fitted and who are fitted. In view of the fact that in each grade there is a limited number of vacancies, it naturally follows that but a small percentage of officers considered for promotion will be classified as best-fitted officers. A large majority of officers, due to shortage of vacancies in each grade, are classified as fitted officers.

It is the policy of the Navy Department to retain 20 percent of fitted officers in the grade of commander; 70 percent of the fitted officers in the grade of lieutenant commander.

The Naval Affairs Committee believes that in view of the expansion of the Navy both in ships and aircraft, and in view of the unsettled world conditions as they exist today, the Navy should retain the services of all these officers, at least until 1944, who have been adjudged as fitted by the selection board.

There would be retired from the service today 23 captains and 33 commanders. The country and the Navy needs the services of these officers at this time.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WALTER. Does this bill take care of those naval aviators to whom the Government owes at least a moral debt?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It takes care of every officer who is classified as fitted, and not ordered to be retained by the President, up until he has served at least 30 years in the rank of captain, 28 years in the rank of commander, and 26 years in the rank of lieutenant commander. That is the amendment that I am discussing now. It will retain in the service during this period, from now to 1944, approximately some 250 or 300 officers who otherwise would go out as fitted officers.

There can be no justification with the expansion of the Navy for the wholesale retirement that is brought about among fitted officers.

Now, of course, when the selection board fails to designate an officer as best fitted or as fitted, the officer goes out of the service under certain conditions as the law applies in his case.

The retention as provided for in this amendment will not only save for the country and the Navy, but it will give the officer personnel a more secure feeling insofar as a career in the Navy is concerned, and it will permit the officers adjudged as fitted to remain in the service until 1944 or until they have completed 30, 28, and 26 years, respectively, of commissioned service in the Navy. Thirty years for captains, 28 years for commanders, and 26 years for lieutenant commanders.

In plain language this amendment keeps in the service all officers designated by the selection board as fitted officers whether he be assigned to "engineering duty only," "aeronautical engineering duty only," or to duty in the line.

I earnestly hope that there will be no hesitancy on the part of the House in approving this section, for it means the retention of some 300 officers between now and 1944 who would go on the retired list without this amendment.

In the redraft of subsection k of section 12, the same purposes are served that are now provided in this subsection of the act, with a slight extension of the second proviso. This proviso covers the promotion on the retirement of World War lieutenants. In the law as it stands today, it applies only to such lieutenants as are retired consequent to failure of selection as best fitted and of adjudgment as fitted. As extended in the redraft, it provides that those lieutenants "retired under any provision of law" are promoted upon retirement.

The last amendment to the act as provided in the bill providing for the discharge of lieutenants (junior grade) reported by the selection board as "lacking in aptitude for the naval service" restricts the application to those junior lieutenants who are serving under probationary appointments. In other words, it will not apply to those who have already passed through the probationary appointment as provided under a prior law.

Now, let me digress to say that we have just cause to be proud of the officer and enlisted personnel of our Navy.

The officers, while midshipmen at the Naval Academy, receive the finest education that it is possible for them to get during the 4 years at that institution and upon graduation officers do not put aside their books and consider their education complete. All through their careers they are studying and taking postgraduate and Naval War College courses as well as constantly reading to keep abreast of the times in engineering, gunnery, seamanship, and navigation. I measure my words when I say that our officer personnel is not surpassed by that of any other naval power.

Our enlisted personnel is composed of virile young men unsurpassed by any other similar body of men in the world. Every one of them is given a searching investigation, and he must come up to the high standard set before being accepted for enlistment. The education of our average enlisted man consists of about 3 years of high-school work.

Wherever they go or whatever they do, they reflect credit not only upon the Navy but upon the country as well.

There can be no comparison between the enlisted man of today with the enlisted man of yesterday.

If at any time our Navy is put to the test, the country can rest assured that these young men, led by our capable officers, will make history that you and I and generations to come will be proud to read.

There is no doubt in my mind but that the personnel of the Navy will more than live up to the highest traditions as set by such immortals as John Paul Jones, Perry, Farragut, Dewey, Schley, and others. [Applause.]

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, while I am in complete approval of the general purposes of the bill, it does contain an amendment proposed by the committee of sufficient importance to justify me, I believe, in bringing it to the special attention of the membership of the Committee because eventually it will affect every single one of us in our appointments to the academy at Annapolis. I refer to the amendment which the chairman emphasized, found on page 3 of the bill—an amendment to section 12 of the present Promotion Act. The effect of this amendment will be to keep in active service all fitted officers who otherwise would be let out of the service.

It is not a pleasant duty for me, a member of the committee, to take the floor in opposition to a committee amendment, but I do feel that the Committee should have an explanation of the matter.

For several years one of the principal problems of the Navy Department has been to work out a program through which the officer personnel would be promoted, which would be equitable and fair to all. After several efforts the Promotion Act of 1938 was adopted. The purpose of this bill is to correct imperfections in that act. Under that act each year the selection board meets, canvasses the list of officers who are eligible for promotion, and segregates them into three groups. One group is composed of those officers best fitted for promotion. A second group is composed of those who are fitted for promotion. The third group are the remaining number of officers who are not fitted for promotion and who are automatically retired.

Those who are selected as best fitted are automatically promoted to the vacancies in the higher grades that might exist. In the event that there are any further vacancies, those who are fitted are then promoted, and the remainder are let out. Under the amendment adopted by the committee, all those officers who are not selected as best fitted, who are not necessary to fill the vacancies in the higher grades, would still be kept in the service. The result of that would be to stifle and to stagnate the promotion system that we have been struggling for years to adopt, and the eventual result of it will be that we will have to have fewer candidates for admission to the Naval Academy at Annapolis. The curious part of this to me is that the Navy Department itself is strongly opposed to it, for the reason that these additional officers are not needed. The justification given by the chairman of the committee for this amendment is that with our increased naval-expansion program we are going to need more officers than we have now. Under the act as it is at present, if it is necessary to have more officers, the President has the authority to retain every single one of these officers who are not selected for promotion. I call to your attention the fact that the cost of this amendment would be $4,882,000. It can be best explained by the words of Admiral Richardson, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, himself:

> What we need is more younger officers of lower grades. We can and will employ these officers, but they will be doing jobs not commensurate with their rank.

Let me interrupt the Admiral here to call attention to this fact. The United States Navy, grade for grade, is the oldest navy in the world in age of the personnel, and here in this amendment we are proposing to continue in active service the older men. Admiral Richardson says:

> We will, in fact, be using high-priced men, as it were, for low-priced jobs. It is an extravagant process, but we will do it, and, of course, it will have the advantage of freeing some younger officers who otherwise would be doing those duties, for other assignments, and will thus be a net gain in total number.

I think you should know of the effect that this amendment will have; that it is not necessary; that the President right now, under existing law, has authority to keep in the service every single one of these officers if they are needed, but we have been advised by the Navy Department that they are not needed. Yet in spite of that we seem ready to spend $4,682,000 entirely unnecessarily. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree with my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. COLE], a member of the committee, because we are facing a situation now of a shortage of officers in the Navy; in fact, every ship captain and every navy-yard commandant is crying to the Bureau of Navigation for additional officers. It is true they are asking for younger officers, but there is no reason at all why these so-called older officers cannot be given some of the assignments of those immediately junior to them all down the line, and thereby releasing junior officers for these additional duties.

We have a tremendous investment in these officers, and it seems to me utterly ridiculous for us to take any youngster and educate him at some twenty-eight or thirty thousand dollars' cost at the Naval Academy and then further spend a great deal more money on him, really making him a naval officer after graduation, and when he comes to the point of his greatest usefulness push him out into the world when he has been trained for nothing else but a naval career. These officers going out at comparatively young ages have no equipment for any other pursuit than a naval career. At a time when the Navy is expanding and we are building more ships and putting them in commission every day, I cannot see the justification for pushing these officers out on the retired list and loading up the already overburdened retired list.

There is no justification for our placing officers from 40 to 50 years old on the retired list at $2,500 or $3,000 a year, when they have many years of useful service left in them for the benefit of the Government and the Navy. Every time you place one of those officers on the retired list you replace him with a new midshipman who becomes an ensign, and you have both the cost of this officer on the retired list and the new ensign.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does the passage of this bill remedy the evil which you are discussing?

Mr. MAAS. To a large extent, certainly until 1944, it does, because under our proposal every competent officer will be retained in the Navy until he has had 26 or 28 or 30 years of service, dependent upon his rank at that time.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does this protect the lieutenant commanders, too?

Mr. MAAS. It does. It does exactly that thing. Particularly it affects those in whom many of us are especially interested, the wartime naval aviator; the young man who came in and volunteered his services in 1917 and 1918 and dedicated his life to the service, who today is going to be pushed out into the world at a relatively young age, as far as his useful career is concerned, but yet too old to be absorbed in the commercial-aviation industry, the only field he is trained for.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. DARDEN. This amendment does not contemplate keeping those officers found not fit?

Mr. MAAS. Oh, not at all. None of us can justify that. Nobody on the committee even proposed that.

Mr. DARDEN. Then I must have misunderstood the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH], because I thought what he stated contemplated keeping all those officers.

Mr. MAAS. I assumed the gentleman from New York was querying me in regard to my statement, which was that every competent officer would be retained. The gentleman from New York asked me if that meant all of them.

Of course, I meant all competent officers. There are three classes of officers created as a result of the action of selection boards. The officer who is found best fitted is promoted to the next higher grade to fill a vacancy. Then there is the group of officers who are found fitted; then there is the group who are found neither fitted nor best fitted, and those officers are retired, as they should be. We do not desire to retain in the Navy an officer who is not competent for his duties.

Mr. DARDEN. This amendment does not affect that last class, of course?

Mr. MAAS. Of course, it does not protect the incompetent officer, but we have today in this second group of officers who have been judged fitted another narrowing down to the recommendation of a percentage of those who shall be retained on active duty. What we want to do is to retain all fitted officers.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. What this amendment accomplishes is exactly what was written by the House in the bill when it passed last year?

Mr. MAAS. Exactly.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That all fitted officers should be retained; and when the bill was finally enacted into law the percentage of fitted officers to be retained was put in the bill?

Mr. MAAS. That is correct.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And this now puts it back exactly where the committee sought to put it when it enacted the law in 1938, as it passed the House?

Mr. MAAS. As I recall, the bill last year was reported out of the Naval Affairs Committee unanimously and passed the House. That was the mandate of the House. What we are doing under the present bill is to restore the original provisions that were enacted in the bill that passed the House last year.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, we are educating at Annapolis about three times as many boys as we really should; that is, they are not finally accepted after a few years' service. Is not this the fact?

Mr. MAAS. Relatively speaking. It is not a few years but a comparatively few years. Seventy-two percent of the total commissioned strength of the Navy is in the first three lower grades. You might liken it to a great flat base and then suddenly narrowing down into a shaft. I believe we are educating too many boys at the Naval Academy.

Mr. LORD. Then the remedy would be to cut down the number sent to Annapolis, making it 200 instead of 500 a year.

Mr. MAAS. I do not know what the exact number should be, but I certainly agree with the gentleman from New York that we ought to cut down at least one appointment; and I hope that the Appropriations Committee in the next appropriation bill will reduce the number from four to three.

Mr. LORD. After the men have served a few years, then they select the favorites, maybe, and they are retained and the rest of the men are out on their ears.

Mr. MAAS. They are not favorites. They are selected on the basis of their records. The selection board is doing the most conscientious job they can. It is not any question of favoritism; it is a question of the limitation of the number of vacancies to be filled.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. Is it not a fact that the Navy Department opposed the adoption of this amendment?

Mr. MAAS. I would not say they opposed it. They did not enthusiastically endorse it, but they did not oppose it; no.

Mr. ANDREWS. My understanding is that the Navy Department is opposed to the provisions of this amendment.

Mr. MAAS. They did not show any violent opposition before our committee; and there was an agreement with the Navy Department in the matter of the original bill last year to this same effect, as that bill did exactly what we are seeking to do now.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. DITTER. The gentleman made the observation that the Appropriations Committee might change the number. Would the gentleman also recommend that the Appropriations Committee should write a limitation on the pay-of-the-Navy item providing that no selection should ensue during the following year?

Mr. MAAS. No. I could not agree with the gentleman on that because it would do more harm than good.

Mr. DITTER. Could we not hold the entire matter in abeyance so that we might study the entire personnel problem?

Mr. MAAS. We have been studying it very assiduously in our committee, and we feel that this is the most workable program that can be obtained for the next 4 or 5 years.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Is it not a fact that this amendment really provides for retaining in the Navy the best fitted men that are about to go out at a crucial moment when we are rehabilitating not only our shore establishments but our entire fleet?

Mr. MAAS. The term "best fitted" is a legal term. I understand what the gentleman means, however, that they are fitted. I agree with the gentleman that we should retain them.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Does not the gentleman from Minnesota believe that his language was a little strong when he expressed the hope that the Appropriations Committee, through a limitation, would reduce the number of midshipmen to be sent to the academy? As a matter of fact, it will be 1948 before we get the authorized number of officers permitted by law. I am satisfied that upon reflection the distinguished gentleman will feel that his remarks were a little strong.

Mr. MAAS. I disagree with the distinguished gentleman from Georgia. Too many of the men graduating from the Naval Academy are being shoved off into civilian life. If we had some way of retaining a greater number of them throughout their career, I would agree with the gentleman.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. COLE of New York. Is it not true that every single one of these fitted officers could be called into service under present law if they were needed?

Mr. MAAS. Oh, they could be, of course. That is a matter that is within the discretion of the President. The fact remains, however, that the Navy is not keeping them. They are competent officers. Every time we let one of them go we are put to the double expense of his retirement pay and the pay of an ensign who steps into his place. There is no justification for it, especially at a time when world conditions are so critical. We cannot justify doing this thing.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. SUTPHIN. This would permit the retention of 300 fitted officers until 1944. Is that correct?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman states that these are competent officers. Is it not a fact that they are the most competent officers? Because the best fitted have already been selected, and those classed as "fitted" also have been selected. These who are left are not selected because we cannot make room for them.

Mr. MAAS. The gentleman is right; and they are competent officers. It is very difficult, as a matter of fact, to draw the line between the so-called best fitted and fitted officers. We have the two classes solely because of the lack of vacancies, not because of any great apparent differences in the officers themselves.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, as a former enlisted man in the Navy, I grasp this opportunity to speak on behalf of the commissioned personnel by reason of the fact that we of the enlisted ranks always recognize the commissioned personnel as the leadership of the Navy. During the discussion here today much has been said about the selection of officers. My knowledge of the Navy has convinced me the officer personnel of the Navy is based on the enlisted personnel. In other words, there are so many admirals for so many captains, and so many captains for so many commanders, and on down the line.

It is true that every year the selection board meets and selects the number of captains in accordance with the number of admirals. Ofttimes there are many captains who are physically and mentally fit to be advanced in rank, but by reason of the number of captains to be selected being restricted according to the number of admirals, some annually are denied the privilege of promotion.

Under section K of the old bill—Public, No. 703—the officers concerned were required to request that they be continued on active duty for a prescribed period if they did not want to be honorably discharged earlier, as per line 5 of the section.

The new amendment, page 3, line 12, to page 4, line 1, makes such request unnecessary and continues them on active duty until the periods of time specified elsewhere in the bill have expired.

This is a very desirable change, as it protects the rights of the naval officer to continue in active service by statutory requirement rather than by administrative action on his request.

The principal point in this bill is the amendment on page 3, lines 16 to 21, inclusive. This will result in reducing very materially the retirement of officers of experience who are fitted for promotion but who would be eliminated under the law at present. Many such officers would retire each year, starting now. This amendment will prevent their retirement and will extend their periods of active duty 2 years or more.

It will result in there being more captains and commanders than are needed for sea duty, but these fitted officers could be used to fine advantage at many shore stations. This should enable the best-fitted officers to get even more sea service than at present, which should improve their training for high command. It will give the Government 1 or more years' valuable service out of these officers before they are retired. As illustration: Under the present law 23 commanders would have to retire in June 1939, whereas under the new law they would not be retired until June 1940 and 1941. Retired officers lose touch, hence usefulness, very quickly after retirement. Under existing world conditions, as well as the expansion program for national defense, these officers would be well retained on active duty for several years longer and their services used to good advantage. The purpose of the act of June 1938 was just that; in its operation the law fell short of the intent of Congress. Congress meant to keep these officers, but the law was so worded as not to give effect to that intent. This amendment makes that intent effective.

But the time will come, 2 years or more hence, when even these officers must go, hence there must be an increase in the number of new officers coming into the Navy each year to fill their places. The Navy is very short of young officers, especially lieutenants and young lieutenant commanders. This amendment cannot make good this shortage, but the general increase in numbers asked for elsewhere—appropriation bill—does.

The numerical effect of the amendment:

Officers now scheduled for retirement in the year shown who will be kept on for one or more years under the amendment

	1939	1940	1941	1942	1943	1944
Commanders	23
Lieutenant commanders	33	40
Lieutenants			63	16	7	8
	56	40	63	16	7	8

Grand total, 190 officers.

In addition, it is estimated that about 160 more officers will become due for retirement under the law up to 1944. In short, the amendment will keep on active duty for additional periods of a year or more about 350 officers who would otherwise be retired prior to 1944, of whom 56 would retire in June of this year.

As the gentleman from Minnesota said, the Navy is expanding at the present time. Very often social and political activities enter into the selection of these officers; and the selection board selects a certain group of officers and tells the remainder, a group of trained men, that they have no place in the Navy. Is that just treatment to men who selected the Navy as a career?

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further demands for time, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 944), is hereby amended as follows:

Section 5, strike out subsection (a) and substitute the following:

"(a) The board for the recommendation of line officers for promotion to the grades of rear admiral and captain shall consist of nine rear admirals on the active list of the line of the Navy, not restricted by law to the performance of shore duty only. The board for the recommendation of line officers for promotion to the grade of commander shall consist of nine officers above the grade of commander on the active list of the line of the Navy, not restricted by law to the performance of shore duty only, not less than five of whom shall be rear admirals. These boards shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy and convened at least once each year and at such times as the Secretary of the Navy may direct."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 2, strike out "nine officers above the grade of commander" and insert "three rear admirals and six captains."

Page 2, line 5, strike out "not less than five of whom shall be rear admirals."

Page 2, after line 8, insert the following:

"Section 5, subsection (c), add the following sentence: 'The commander in chief, United States Fleet, may not serve on any such board.' "

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOBBS: Page 1, section 2 of Public, No. 703, Seventy-fifth Congress, approved June 23, 1938, strike out "5½" and insert in lieu thereof "6."

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to change the percentage of officer personnel in relation to the enlisted personnel of the Navy, putting it back where the House bill had it when we passed it in 1938. In other words, if you consider the officer personnel of the Navy as a pyramid, the remedy here applied would simply broaden the top one-half of 1 percent. This would amount to an increase in the authorized strength of 480 officers. It would save for service about 100 officers a year that are now being kicked out, not through unfitness but because there is no room in the narrowing point of the pyramid. This would broaden it to the extent that we could save from the stigma of disgrace of enforced separation about 100 officers a year. This amendment would strike out the Senate amendment which substituted 5½ for the 6 percent which the bill we passed carried.

I can see no objection, because the distribution of the officer strength is unchanged; therefore I beg the committee to stand by its bill of last year and to increase, for an expanding naval building program, the officer personnel of the Navy by this very small percentage.

Mr. IZAC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I yield gladly to the gentleman from California.

Mr. IZAC. Is it not true, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, we will keep off the retired list 100 officers in the prime of their lives who are of real value to the Navy today?

Mr. HOBBS. There is no question about that, and I thank the distinguished gentleman, who wears the Congressional Medal of Honor, for his suggestion.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. With pleasure.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I wish the gentleman would explain how the statement made by the gentleman from California is correct, when he says by increasing the number from 5½ to 6 percent we will keep from being retired 100 officers who are well qualified? That has no relation whatsoever to retirement, regardless of how many men you put in officer rank in the Navy.

Mr. IZAC. Is it not true that it also keeps a certain number of officers on the active list who would otherwise find no place when it comes time to select them for a vacancy that does not exist?

Mr. HOBBS. That is certainly true.

Mr. Chairman, I have the highest regard for the distinguished chairman of our Committee on Naval Affairs and for his erudition and his profound wisdom on the subject of Navy selection. I recognize the fact that what the gentleman is advancing as a derailing switch for this idea is that we have not yet reached the maximum authorized by law for the officer personnel and may not do so for several years; but I would say that the Navy hierarchy and the distinguished gentleman himself estimated it would take until 1945 for us to reach the strength authorized in the bill we passed in 1935, but we went above that strength of 6,531 last year, if we count the aviation cadets.

I believe this amendment is fundamentally sound, for the reasons I have advanced and those which our distinguished colleague from California pointed out. It will overcome the present tendency, which has nearly doubled the cost to the American taxpayers within the last 4 years of the retirement pay rolls. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust the Committee will reject this amendment. Under the law the officer personnel today is 5½ percent of the enlisted personnel. The officer strength of the Navy is based on the authorized enlisted strength of the Navy. The authorized enlisted strength of the Navy is 137,485.

In writing this bill last year, after long hearings by committees of both the House and the Senate, it was determined that 5½ percent was the percentage of officer personnel that was needed in the Navy, and this would provide for 7,562 officers.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBBS. The gentleman did put in the bill his committee reported, however, that 6 percent was needed.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes; that is true. When the committee reported the bill to the House, the bill carried 6 percent, and the House passed the bill with the 6-percent provision in it. However, after a long hearing with the Senate conferees, after the Senate gave us the benefit of their views, and after the Navy further collaborated on the matter, the conclusion was reached that 5½ percent was all that was needed. This was worked out to a mathematical certainty—not by jumping at the conclusion that so many officers were needed—by detailing officers at various places. The adoption of this amendment merely means there will be 480 more officers, that is all; yet you cannot obtain the officers authorized under the 5½ percent until 1948. What is the use of saying you are going to have 6 percent officers when you cannot get 5½ percent officers until 1948? If in 1948 it becomes necessary to have 6 percent officers, we will have 6 percent; but there is absolutely no justification today for fixing it at 6 percent any more than at 7 percent, or 8 percent, or 9 percent, when you know you cannot obtain them over a long period of time. Therefore, I respectfully request of the Committee, in all deference to the interest of our friend from Alabama in personnel legislation, that this amendment be rejected.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBBS. Was not the situation substantially the same when the gentleman reported from his committee and urged the House to pass the bill of 1938 which the House did pass?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. But after listening further to the argument as to why we could not use 6 percent, we were willing to compromise at 5½ percent; and I repeat, the number of officers needed has been worked out to a mathematical certainty.

Mr. HOBBS. The distribution percentages are the same, however?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes; but this does not have anything to do with the distribution. This just means more admirals and more captains and more lieutenants and more commanders all down the line.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOBBS) there were—ayes 37, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 7, in subsections (a) and (b), strike out "or who is not physically qualified."

Section 8, in subsection (a), strike out "other than medical."

Section 9, in subsection (a), after the word "act" in line 7, insert "exclusive of officers who are or may become on promotion additional numbers in grade."

Section 9, strike out subsection (f) and substitute the following:

"(f) All reports of recommendations of a line selection board under any provision of law shall require the concurrence of at least two-thirds of the members."

Section 11, in subsection (b), at the end of the second proviso insert "with retired pay computed as provided in section 12 (b) of this act."

Section 12, subsection (f), in line 5 change "from" to "to", and in line 6, after "promoted", insert "computed as provided in subsection (b) of this section."

Section 12, strike out subsection (k) and substitute the following:

"(k) Lieutenant commanders and lieutenants with date of rank as such prior to June 23, 1938, and lieutenants (junior grade) who on that date were carried as additional numbers in grade by reason of not having been recommended for promotion, shall, at their own request, in lieu of honorable discharge as provided in subsection (c) of this section, be retired on June 30 of the fiscal year in which they fail of selection as best fitted the second time or on June 30 of the fiscal year in which they complete the period of service designated in the act of March 3, 1931, as amended (U. S. C., title 34, Supp. III, secs. 286a and 286i), whichever date shall be later: Provided, That any officer retained on the active list pursuant to this subsection shall be ineligible for consideration for promotion by subsequent selection boards: Provided further That lieutenants who served in the Navy or Naval Reserve Force prior to November 12, 1918, and who shall have completed not less than 21 years of service shall, if retired under any provision of law, be advanced to the grade of lieutenant commander on the retired list: And provided further, That the retired pay of officers retired pursuant to this subsection shall be computed as provided in subsection (b) of this section on the basis of the active duty pay of their rank on the retired list."

Section 14, in line 9 of subsection (a), after "grade" insert "with probationary appointments."

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, after line 18, insert the following:

"Section 9, strike out subsection (d) and amend subsection (e) to read as follows:

"'(d) The recommendations of selection boards in the case of officers who are now or may hereafter be assigned to engineering duty only or to aeronautical engineering duty only shall be based upon their comparative fitness for the duties prescribed for them by law. Upon promotion they shall be carried as additional numbers in grade. Officers assigned to aeronautical engineering duty only shall succeed to command on shore only when designated to do so by the Secretary of the Navy.'"

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOBBS to the committee amendment: On page 2, in line 24, strike out the word "comparative," and on page 2, line 25, after the word "law" change the period to a comma and insert "in comparison with other officers in the same kind of service, but not by comparison with officers of the line of the Navy proper; and each such officer who is fitted for the performance of his duties shall be selected for promotion."

Mr. HOBBS. I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs if he will not agree to this amendment?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. Certainly.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I would like for the gentleman to inform the committee the justification that exists for his amendment. What is the necessity for changing the law from what it is today with reference to the "engineering duty only officers"? Under the law today the engineering-duty officers are not in competition among themselves; they are in competition with the line of the Navy.

Mr. HOBBS. That is right.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The aeronautical engineers are in competition with themselves only.

Mr. HOBBS. That is right.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Now we take away that and put both of them together under the amendment. The gentleman proposes to amend that by making the competition in both of these engineering ranks among themselves.

Mr. HOBBS. That is right, sir.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I would like for the gentleman to explain his reason for it and his justification for it.

Mr. HOBBS. I am greatly surprised at the inquiry of the distinguished chairman of our committee. He knows just as well as I do what is back of this amendment. Not only that, but I have gone over this amendment with him repeatedly, urging its plain and cogent justification. You might just as well compare a Coca-Cola peddler in the grandstand with the first baseman on the Washington Senators as to compare a man who inspects armor plate and tests it in his laboratory in the Philadelphia Navy Yard with an admiral of the fleet. There is no possible way to compare a specialist doing specialist's duties, because of peculiar fitness, with a man on the high seas running a battleship. That is one of the reasons, and the gentleman knows it. The present method of selection is cruelly unfair because the hierarchy in the Navy have a small club on their Mount Olympus which they want to keep exclusive, so they contend that no specialist should ever become an admiral. The Olympians do not want a specialist to advance because of efficiency in his specialty. They want him to be compared with them on their ability to run the fleet. That is the way the law is now and that is why so few specialists get promoted to the rank of admiral. This amendment would make specialists comparable only with officers engaged in the performance of similar duties.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I am happy to yield to my learned colleague of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALTER. Do I understand the gentleman to mean that unless his amendment is adopted, the very capable, highly specialized head of the aircraft factory at Philadelphia Navy Yard could be relieved of his duty and be succeeded by a man who knew nothing at all about aviation?

Mr. HOBBS. Of course, that is true.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. HOBBS. Of course, that is true. His promotion, his retention in that specialized duty, is dependent upon his selection by a selection board that is charged by law to compare his fitness for promotion with those who run a fleet, an examination that may be upon gunnery on the high seas or it may be upon any one of a dozen things that are routine on the high seas, but that he has not had anything to do with in 20 years.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman state what will be the effect of his amendment, if adopted?

Mr. HOBBS. It would be simply to require the selection boards to compare specialists with men engaged in similar service in the Navy. The comparison would be between men who are performing similar service for Uncle Sam and not between a scientist testing armor plate, and a navigator.

I submit to the sanity of this House that this amendment is of vital importance to those men who desire to make a career for themselves based on their specialized fitness for the best service to Uncle Sam, and that each of us has a stake in this issue, because unless we adopt this amendment you will have continued the mad scramble of scientists and specialists to get enough sea duty so that they may be promoted.

This is the only way you can give us career men in the American Navy, and I submit this vital amendment should be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, let me call the Committee's attention to the law as it exists today, so that you can get briefly a picture of what is involved here.

This relates to two technical groups of officers in the Navy—aeronautical engineers and engineers assigned to that duty only.

Under the law today we fixed it to give these aeronautical engineers exactly what they wanted the last time the committee had this bill under consideration, which was during the last session of the Congress. We provided that the recommendation of the board in case of officers who are now or may hereafter be assigned to aeronautical engineering duty only shall be based upon their comparative fitness among themselves for the technical duties prescribed for them by law.

Now, what does that mean? It means that this little group of some 54 aeronautical engineers, when it comes up for selection, is not in competition with the line officer, but is in competition with the other men assigned to that technical duty.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a correction?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WALTER. There are 49 such officers.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. All right, 49; and there are 64 engineer officers.

Then there is another technical group known as EDO's—engineering duty only.

Bear in mind we had these officers come here from Philadelphia and other places in the country who are technical officers and they said that was exactly what they wanted. They did not want to be drawn into competition with other officers of the Navy. That was last year.

The engineering duty officers did not want that. They wanted a separate provision, and, therefore, we gave them this one:

> The recommendation of the board in case of officers who are now or may hereafter be assigned to engineering duty only shall be based upon their comparative fitness for the duty prescribed for them by law.

They did not want competition just among themselves. They wanted competition among the line officers, due to what reason? Due to the reason that they command on shore, and they could not command a navy yard unless taken in competition with Navy officers who command at sea. Another reason: These officers go to sea because they are the officers who make report upon the operation of all of the boilers and machinery in the ships, and how could they do that unless they went to sea; and would it not be right and fair and proper that they be in competition with all line officers, and that is exactly what they want. No longer than 3 hours ago the admiral appeared before Mr. Hulls and came to my office and said they wanted this law with reference to the EDO exactly as we put it in the bill.

In reference to the aeronautical engineers, last year we gave them exactly what they wanted. They said they wanted competition among themselves, and now this year they come in before the committee and they say they do not want competition among themselves, but they want competition all down the line. So I say to you gentlemen that we are trying to do exactly what these specialists want done, and it is most difficult for us to find out what they want, because when the shoe pinches one year they want it changed the next year so as to suit their ideas then.

I submit to the Committee that the judgment of the Committee on Naval Affairs, after weeks of investigation of this matter, should be given preference in this respect, at least when we are following the viewpoint of these technical officers who are involved, and I earnestly hope that this amendment will be rejected; and if it so develops that any injustice is being done to them and they are not satisfied, we shall have other days here, and we will come back again and try to correct these things.

Mr. MAAS. This is exactly what the aeronautical-duty officers want and the Bureau itself wants.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is right. We are trying to do what they want done. If we make a mistake, it is their fault and not ours.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was rather interested in listening to the last remarks of my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] that if this does not work out in an equitable way we can come back later and take care of it. That is what we have been hearing for a long while. Ever since I have been a Member of the House, that is what I have been hearing with reference to Navy matters. All I know about the Navy, so far as personnel is concerned, is that there is a lot of naval politics played down there. Politics is played, not only in this Chamber and in the Senate Chamber, but apparently there is quite a political machine down in the Navy Department. Of course, the officers cannot talk out openly. They are not going to take any chance of injuring themselves, but they talk to you and to me privately, and they tell us in confidence what confronts them. I introduced a bill—H. R. 4677—and promises were made last year that the matter involved would be taken care of this year. We have civil engineers and instructors, officers in the Navy, who are discriminated against. A promise was made last year that they would be taken care of this year. This year I introduced a bill and I was given assurance that I would be given a hearing next Monday. On the other hand, I understood, there was going to be an amendment offered to the pending bill calling for a survey of staff officers to be made, and that is why I asked my friend from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] if he was going to offer such an amendment. I could not get a direct answer out of him, but afterward, privately, he told me he would not, but if the amendment was offered, and assuming my point of order was overruled and the amendment was adopted, then I would have a hearing before his committee next Monday, which would be just a joke. A survey is a polite way of sidetracking my bill for this session.

Mr. MAAS. Oh, the committee is intending to have a hearing next Monday.

Mr. McCORMACK. I know the gentleman from Minnesota, and I will back him any time. I know of no one for whom I have a greater feeling of admiration and respect than I have for the gentleman from Minnesota. I remember a case I had before the Naval Affairs Committee of an individual who was trying to correct a record of injustice, unconsciously done, and for 3 years the gentleman from Minnesota and I fought to correct it, and we did finally succeed in correcting it, but I would never have done it if it had not been for the gentleman from Minnesota; so that any time the gentleman says anything to me, his word is as good as his bond, the same as with any other Member, but I say that of the gentleman from Minnesota in particular. I wonder if the gentleman knew an amendment was proposed to be offered to the bill calling for a survey of staff officers, and, of course, the gentleman knows that if that happens it would be useless to have hearings on my bill next Monday.

Mr. MAAS. The chairman discussed that with me, and I asked him not to offer such an amendment at this time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts if a survey were made it would give the gentleman a great deal of beneficial light on the subject.

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, now, that is a question of fact. I have a right to differ. I sometimes wonder how much these who are obsessed with an idea really know about it. Sometimes when we become obsessed with an idea we become one-track-minded. I sometimes feel if we would establish a special committee from this House who had never had any associations with the Navy Department in the past to look into the selection of personnel for promotion we would get a better idea and we would have a more impartial and disinterested approach. You and I know as practical men, as members of different committees, that we sort of approach legislation from the angle of friendships and attachments that we make. Those friendships and attachments are bound to have an influence upon our judgment.

When this bill comes up next Monday, I hope I will get the proper consideration.

I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] is a good one. Personally I think it is a sound one. Apparently the chairman says that under the present law the same results can be obtained. If so, what is the objection to accepting the amendment? Then there will be no question about the meaning of the existing law. The chairman of the committee says that under the present law it can be done. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] says it cannot be done. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] then concedes it could be done. If that is so, why not adopt the amendment and remove any difficulties? It will clarify it. Then, next Monday I hope that when I come before the Naval Affairs Committee—and I am looking to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] for great assistance, and my other friends on the committee—that I will not go up against stacked cards, where the committee is going to report out a survey instead of a bill that should be reported out to meet the existing trying situation which H. R. 4677 tends to solve. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

As some evidence, or should I say proof conclusive, that there is a distinction that should be recognized, and will be recognized if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] is adopted, may I read something that Admiral Cook wrote last November concerning this class of officers:

> As Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, I am greatly concerned over the need for A. E. D. O.'s particularly in view of the pending expansion of the aeronautical organization and the greatly accelerated rate of progress abroad. The Bureau is largely dependent upon the strength and effectiveness of this group for its material and progress in aeronautical matters. They are responsible for the high state of technical development existing in naval aviation today, and are in direct charge of the design, construction, integrity, and readiness of the aeronautical material under the cognizance of this Bureau. Their responsibilities and importance to the efficiency of our aviation material have increased greatly and will continue to increase far out of proportion to the number of officers in the group or who have the technical qualifications to perform their duties.

I submit respectfully that in face of the very flat statement made by the admiral this amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] should be adopted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS] to the pending committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VINSON of Georgia) there were ayes 61 and noes 50.

So the amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Committee amendment: On page 3, in line 7, strike out "(f)" and insert "(e)", and in the same line strike out the word "of" where it occurs the first time and insert the word "or."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Committee amendment: On page —, beginning after line 15, insert the following:
> "Section 12, subsection (f), add the following proviso: 'Provided further, That until June 30, 1944, such officers shall not be retired until they shall have completed the periods of commissioned service prescribed for their respective grades in subsection (d) of this section for fitted officers recommended for retention on the active list.'"

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise simply to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that this is the amendment which I discussed a short time ago. The effect of this amendment, briefly, will be to freeze into the service some 300 officers who otherwise would go out and who are not needed. It would stagnate the present scheme of promotion, a problem that we have worked on for years. It would cost, unnecessarily, $4,682,000. If it ever happens that these men are needed in case of an emergency, they are always subject to call. If those men are now needed on the active list, because of our naval expansion program, under existing law the President has the authority to keep them in the service.

I feel that if it is the wish of this Committee to keep those officers on the active list simply for the purpose of giving them a job, the Committee should definitely say so with its eyes open.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. As I stated when I explained the various provisions of this bill, the object and purpose of this committee amendment is to retain in service all officers found by the selection board as being fitted officers until 1944, or until they have served their time in their group, which is 30 years for captains, 28 years for commanders, and 26 years for lieutenant commanders.

If this amendment is not adopted some 50 officers will go out on June 1. I earnestly hope the Committee will adopt this committee amendment.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HOBBS. Has the distinguished chairman of the committee an amendment to add to the committee amendment?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes; I am about to offer it.

Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia to the committee amendment: Page 3, line 21, change the period to a comma and add the following: "and they may become eligible for selection as provided and as limited in said section (d) of this section."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the object and purpose of this amendment is to provide that these officers retained as fitted officers will still be eligible for consideration by the selection board. Their retention as best-fitted officers, in other words, under this amendment, does not close the door of hope in their hearts, but opens the door of opportunity to them.

I ask that the amendment be agreed to, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COLE of New York) there were—ayes 81, noes 9.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAAS: On page 4, after line 23, add a new paragraph as follows:

"Section 12, subsection (d), strike out all the language in parentheses in lines 7 to 11."

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to correct a situation which has arisen under the 1938 act. I think, without a realization of its effect, we accepted a recommendation from the Navy Department in the drafting of the language of the bill which for the first time includes the principle that the time spent by Reserve officers during the World War on active duty, or those on temporary commissions in 1917 and 1918, or during their time as chief warrant officer is to be charged up against them for the purpose of determining the 26, 28, and 30 years' time allowed for service in the Navy. The effect of striking out the language as provided in my amendment will be to give these officers, a small group of non-Naval Academy graduates, mostly pilots, the intended 26 years in the Navy as lieutenant commanders, or 28 years as commanders. None of them will be captains.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. What section is the gentleman seeking to amend?

Mr. MAAS. Section 12.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The effect of the gentleman's amendment is to give these officers so many years of commissioned service.

Mr. MAAS. Exactly.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And not to charge against them the years they served as warrant officers and noncommissioned officers.

Mr. MAAS. It also included temporary commissions and Reserve commissions. There was never anything like it in the law before last year, and the whole purpose of it is to throw out a group of non-Naval Academy graduates for the benefit of some Naval Academy graduates who followed them. These men already were put back behind the class of 1919, but on top of that they want to throw them out 4 years sooner. It is simply a method of penalizing the World War officers who were not graduates of the Naval Academy.

They want to throw them out sooner to make more vacancies for that group of Naval Academy graduates. It is an unfair thing. These officers, particularly those who were in aviation, made naval-aviation history. They are the men who went out and pioneered; they created it, they taught the Naval Academy graduates how to fly. Now they are trying to penalize these World War veterans and throw them out 4 years sooner, at a time when we need them so badly as we do at the present.

I hope my amendment will be adopted and that we will permit these officers to serve the same length of time as graduates of the Naval Academy will be allowed to under this bill.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Unless the gentleman's amendment is adopted some of the aces and crack pilots of the Navy will be penalized because they were not graduates of the academy.

Mr. MAAS. Yes; they will be cut off from 4 years' additional service notwithstanding the fact that they are among the outstanding leaders in aviation. I want to give them the same treatment we give Naval Academy graduates. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, with all deference to my distinguished colleague on the committee, I cannot agree with him because I believe he is absolutely wrong in what he is seeking to accomplish.

He is doing an injustice to other officers while at the same time trying to help a group which he stated were non-Naval Academy graduates. He was rather adroit in his argument that we are throwing out enlisted pilots and putting in their places Naval Academy graduates. That is always the kind of argument that is made to get up sympathy for a certain proposition.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MAAS. I would like to know what the gentleman means by the statement this will hurt any other officers. All officers will be retained.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Every officer and every naval enlisted man is entitled to be tried by the same yardstick. It gives these officers 4 years, 6 years, or 2 years longer in the service in their respective grade than the other officer.

Mr. MAAS. If the gentleman will yield further, if that is fair we ought to charge the 4 years that a Naval Academy graduate spends at the Naval Academy. That should be charged up to his 26 years.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. By the amendment we have just adopted, officers who are fitted may stay in who have had 30 years' commissioned service or 26 years' commissioned service, or 28 years' commissioned service. Under the gentleman's amendment if a warrant officer were promoted to a commissioned officer, then he could count in length of service the time he served as a warrant officer.

We had hoped to make them all equal by counting his total service in the Navy and giving them all the same length of service. If you want to give these officers who have heretofore never had that privilege this additional time, if you do not want to count the time that they served, agree to his amendment and you will accomplish just that. Then you will have an officer serving 36 years or 34 years as against an officer who serves 30 years or 28 years.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Suppose an enlisted man went to the Naval Academy, would his time as an enlisted man be counted against his service as an officer later on?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Not at all. May I read the law to you? Here is the section which the gentleman seeks to amend:

(d) Captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders promoted to those grades by reason of adjudgment as fitted for promotion, and recommended by the report of a selection board, as approved by the President, for retention on the active list, may be continued on the active list of the line of the Navy until they shall have completed 30, 28, and 26 years, respectively, of commissioned service (with which commissioned service shall be included service as commissioned warrant officer, active commissioned service in the Naval Reserve Force, service as a midshipman after graduation from the Naval Academy, and service under a temporary commission in the Navy).

The gentleman proposes to exclude all of that service.

Mr. MAAS. If the whole purpose is to hold these people in, why throw them out?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We are not throwing them out.

Mr. MAAS. We are throwing them out 4 years sooner than we should.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. He is kept in the same length of time—30, 28, or 26 years.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAAS) there were—ayes 66, noes 44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia: On page 4, between lines 4 and 5, insert the following: "Section 12, add subsection (m), as follows:

"(m) Officers now serving or who shall hereafter serve as Chief of Naval Operations or as Commander in Chief, United States Fleet, shall upon detachment from duty as Chief of Naval Operations or as commander in chief, United States Fleet, retain the rank of admiral and shall continue to receive the pay and allowances of a rear admiral of the upper half and the personal money allowance of an admiral. When such officers are 66 years old, they shall be retired by the President from active service."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply retains in service the officer who holds the position of commander in chief of the fleet until he is 66 years old. Under the law as it exists today, when a flag officer reaches the age of 64 he goes out. This retains in service also an officer of the rank or assignment of Chief of Naval Operations. In other words, as far as these two important positions in the Navy are concerned, when an officer reaches the age of 64 he goes out. Under my amendment, he will stay in until he is 66 years of age. This would mean the retention for at least 2 years longer of Admiral Leahy, as he happens to be Chief of Operations at the present time. It would apply to whoever succeeds him after he has served until he is 66 years of age. I submit a man who has physical fitness has not lost his usefulness to the Government when he reaches the age of 64 years. I am trying to keep these officers in these important positions until they are 66 years of age.

Mr. HOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBBS. I agree with the gentleman, and I am for his amendment. I simply wished to have him yield in order that I may ask him if he will not extend this same treatment to the captains, who now have no provision made for them?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I cannot agree to that, because it is a very different proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, of Public, No. 703, approved June 23, 1938, change the period to a colon and add: "Provided further, That captains who are not selected for promotion to the grade of rear admirals shall be, by the same board, adjudged either 'fitted' or 'not fitted' for promotion, and if adjudged 'fitted' for promotion shall be retired with the rank of rear admiral with retired pay computed as provided in subsection (b) of this section."

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, as I understand, will not cost the Government one dime. The pay of these officers will be the same whether they are called captains or admirals. This amendment simply means that a captain who under the present legislation is denied the privilege of having the stamp of approval of his fellow officers put upon his work of 30 years, who has gone up to the rank of captain, and who may not now be adjudged fitted for promotion, can have his qualifications determined and, if the stamp of approval of the selection board is put upon him and his work of 30 years in the Navy, he is retired without additional cost to the Government and with the rank of rear admiral. This is fair and it is reasonable.

I am in accord with the position taken by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs with regard to this honor which we have just done these ranking admirals, and I submit the door of opportunity ought to be at least cracked for the benefit of captains in the Navy.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MAAS. I have a great deal of sympathy with what the gentleman is proposing; but does the gentleman realize that in the event of war all these captains who had failed to be selected as admirals would come back on the active list as admirals and have high fleet command?

Mr. HOBBS. I think I have taken everything into account. The adoption of this amendment will tend to do away with the injustice which is now applying to only two of the six or eight categories of officers in the Navy.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBBS. With pleasure I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SUTPHIN. The gentleman is desirous of promoting captains to admirals. Why does he not go right down the line to ensigns and promote them all?

Mr. HOBBS. What is here proposed for captains is now done for most of them. The provision of the law now is that several grades shall be retired in the next higher grade.

Mr. SUTPHIN. With pay and allowances?

Mr. HOBBS. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I sincerely trust, Mr. Chairman, the Committee will reject this amendment. The Committee on Naval Affairs made an investigation along the lines suggested by the gentleman from Alabama for a long time. What does this amendment do? It simply creates a special class of captains, and when they go out they are given the rank of rear admirals. After awhile you would have more admirals in the Navy than officers of any other rank. As was stated by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS], when these men were called back to active duty they would be called back with the rank of admiral, and you would have admirals in charge of admirals.

I certainly hope the Committee rejects this amendment.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Is it not true that only last week certain admirals of the Navy testified we have too many admirals in the Navy today?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Something along that line was said.

I hope in deference to our colleague from Alabama that we will reject this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAAS: On page 4, after line 23, add a new paragraph, as follows:

"Section 13 of Public, No. 703, Seventy-fifth Congress, subsection (a), line 4, change the word 'eight' to 'nine.'"

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is simply to carry out the intention of the Congress in the bill passed last year which we found was never operative because of a decision of the Judge Advocate General which none of us had anticipated. The purpose is to apply the same test of selection to the flag rank as to all other ranks in the Navy.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the Maas amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Minnesota read the part of the law he is seeking to amend?

Mr. MAAS. I may tell the gentleman that it provides that in any one year, if the Secretary of the Navy finds there are to be less than eight vacancies among the rear admirals, he shall convene a board to select enough admirals to be retired to make the average of eight. I am proposing to make this figure nine because we discovered that with the figure set at eight there will probably never be any retirements of rear admirals, because the Judge Advocate General ruled—and I am not questioning his ruling—that the 8 or 9 days this bill was in effect last year included all the vacancies last year for the purpose of averaging with succeeding years, and there happened to be a great many vacancies last year. The result is that you always have the eight vacancies, and no admiral will ever be forced to retire, or probably not at least, under the provisions of this act.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Then the object and purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to force retirement in the rank of admirals?

Mr. MAAS. A very mild retirement provision, so as to subject admirals to the same conditions to which every other officer is subjected.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. How many is it proposed to retire annually?

Mr. MAAS. Under my proposal they would have to maintain an average number of vacancies of nine a year. The principle is the same as we approved last year, except that the figure then was made eight, which simply is below the number that ever will force any retirements among admirals. I believe it is a good thing to have a little goad on the admirals so that when they get the two stars they cannot just sit back and feel that they are set for life.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. As far as I am concerned, it is all right to have a selection in the rank of admiral, but I do not think it should be mandatory that a certain number go out each year.

Mr. MAAS. That is in the law now, except that the law states "eight," but the figure eight does not work. The Congress has adopted the principle involved in this amendment except that the figure we arrived at did not accomplish the intent of Congress. My amendment will accomplish it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. How many, under this amendment, will be forced out?

Mr. MAAS. It varies from year to year. Next year two will be forced out.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And the following year?

Mr. MAAS. The following year there will be a total of six, and then it drops down to one or two again.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Then, do I understand that by this amendment there will be a selection board of admirals to pass on admirals for retention and admirals that go out?

Mr. MAAS. The next amendment I have to offer will accomplish that. That amendment will provide for a board to retain admirals, while this provides that when there are not enough vacancies somebody moves out of the way.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course, the gentleman realizes that what he is doing is this: There is by law permitted to be 65 admirals, and he proposes by his amendment to have a group of admirals appointed by the Secretary to say how many of those 65 admirals shall stay in and which ones shall stay in and which ones shall go out.

Mr. MAAS. We are doing that now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And by that amendment he will cause more confusion and strife in the rank of admiral than ever occurred in any group before.

Mr. MAAS. No; this is just carrying into effect the law we have now. Why should there be one sacred rank in the Navy? I am not opposed to the admirals. I think we have the finest group of admirals in the world, and I want to keep them the finest group of admirals in the world, and that is why I want to have the same weeding-out process for admirals that we have for lieutenants, lieutenant commanders, and commanders and captains.

This does not involve any new principle of legislation at all. It simply provides that what the Congress intended last year shall be carried out, and I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Is this the same amendment the gentleman proposed in committee the other day?

Mr. MAAS. No; this is a different amendment.

Mr. MAGNUSON. That had relation to the retirement?

Mr. MASS. I intend to offer that following the disposition of this amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAAS: Page 4, after line 23, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"SEC. 15. The Secretary of the Navy each fiscal year shall appoint a board of five rear admirals of the upper half whose duty it shall be to report the names of all officers eligible for its consideration who, in its judgment, shall be retained on active duty. Any officer so considered and not recommended for retention by the report of such board, as approved by the President, shall be retired on June 30 of the fiscal year in which he completes 38 years of service, computed as hereafter provided, and shall thereafter receive 75 percent of the active-duty pay of a rear admiral of the upper half. The Secretary of the Navy shall furnish the board with the names of all rear admirals on the active list who have completed over 36 years and less than 38 years of service, counting commissioned service and service as a midshipman after graduation from the Naval Academy, but shall not furnish the name of any rear admiral who has previously been recommended for retention in accordance with this act. All officers whose names are furnished the board as herein provided shall be eligible for its consideration. The board shall conduct its proceedings and make its report in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to the Marine Corps."

Mr. MAAS. The purpose of this amendment is to carry out the same principle. We have selection in every grade now from junior lieutenant on through to flag rank, where it stops. This amendment does not in itself force out any admiral, but it says that they shall be subject at a period during their career as an admiral to selection for retention.

If the board fails to recommend an officer for retention, he shall be retired. Every rear admiral may be recommended for retention, but today you have a situation where a captain once becoming an admiral cannot be touched. He stays on and on, regardless of fitness, until he is 64 years of age.

Sometimes selection boards make mistakes, and when they make a mistake in selecting a flag officer they are stuck with that mistake until that officer is 64 years of age under the present law. Under this proposed amendment all good admirals will be retained, but now and then an officer begins to slow up a little, when he gets to be around 60 or 62 years of age, and this will permit them not to recommend his retention. An officer may show himself to be undesirable, and this permits the Navy to have a method of taking him out of the active service when that situation does arise; also, it has the effect of being a stimulus to every admiral. It puts him under the same hazard and mental stimulus that every other officer is under.

Once a captain is selected to be an admiral, if he knows that nobody can touch him from then on, you know how it may affect him, and what he may do; but if he knows that he has to continue to be on his toes and continue to be human, because he is going to be subject to selection again, it will have the finest effect in the world upon our flag officers; and not only upon them but on every other grade, because then they all know they are going to be subject to the same test from the bottom to the top of the Navy and they know there will be no discrimination. If you want a flow of promotion, you must have it all the way from the bottom to the top.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely carries out the amendment already agreed to?

Mr. MAAS. Yes. To a large extent it has that purpose.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOBBS: On page 3, after line 9, section 10, of the act approved June 23, 1938, Public, No. 703, Seventy-fifth Congress. Change subsection (b) to subsection (c) and insert a new subsection (b), as follows:

"(b) The report of the board shall include a statement of the reasons actuating the selection or promotion of every officer so selected, and also a statement of the reasons actuating the passing over of every officer not selected for promotion."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

Mr. HOBBS rose.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman think his amendment should go one step further and make that confidential, except between the officers involved?

Mr. HOBBS. I considered that after the gentleman mentioned it to me, and I believe it is perfectly clear that it is confidential in the same sense as is the report itself. In other words, it comes between the present subsections (a) and (b), both of which indicate the matter is to be treated somewhat confidentially. I hope the gentleman will not oppose this important and meritorious amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Personally I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DITTER: Page 3, after line 9, insert:
"Strike out section 11 (a) of the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 944), and insert the following as section 11 (a):
"'The names of officers designated by a board as best fitted for promotion and the names of officers adjudged by a board as fitted for promotion and approved by the President shall be placed upon the promotion list, and promotion to fill vacancies shall be made from officers of the next lower grade whose names appear as having been designated as best fitted for promotion on such promotion list in accordance with the date of their original commission in the Regular Navy.'"

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the House is of vital importance to the national-defense program. Plans have been projected and legislation enacted looking toward the increase of the Naval Establishment. Much has been said about the purchase of munitions and the machines of war. Little, if anything, has been said about the most important factor—men. This bill deals with men, with their fitness and with the recognition which should be accorded to the men of the Navy for the service which they render.

The selection system is not a new subject to many of us. We have contended for a long time that injustices and inequities which have prevailed should be corrected. Our efforts have been stubbornly resisted. In spite of widespread complaint, and even in spite of acknowledged abuses, there were those who attempted to defend the system and who opposed every move to correct the conditions which threatened the morale of the Navy.

An intelligent consideration of the proposals now before us require a reference to the conditions that have prevailed since the World War days. Prior to 1917 each class that graduated from the Naval Academy took its place in back of the class that had graduated immediately preceding it. For example, the class of 1915 followed the class of 1914, the class that graduated in 1916 followed the class that graduated in 1915. This was the regular way of inducting officers into the naval service. Congressional appointments to the Naval Academy were based upon the needs for officers in the Navy, and upon graduation from the Naval Academy, the graduates would fill the billets that were necessary in accordance with the naval program.

In 1916 under President Wilson the 1916 building program was launched. It is probable that the imminence of war prompted the launching of this program. At the same time that the building program was undertaken a larger class was entered in the Naval Academy in 1916 than any that had previously been enrolled. This class was destined to graduate as the largest class up to that time that had ever completed the course at the academy.

In 1917 war was declared. In that year and in the years 1918 and 1919 a large number of men from civil life found their way into the naval service and became officers during the emergency. They were not Naval Academy graduates. While the exact figures are not available, it is reasonably safe to say that more than 20,000 officers of this type were in the service at the close of the World War in 1918. The induction of this large group had its effect. It boosted in rank the officers then on the active list of the Regular Navy. For example, members of the class that graduated from the Naval Academy in 1914 became lieutenant commanders in 1918. Officers who graduated from the Naval Academy in 1917 became lieutenants in 1918. Officers were graduated from the Naval Academy in 1917 who were not normally due for graduation until 1918, with the result that in 1918 we find a group of officers labeled as lieutenants when, under ordinary circumstances, they would still have been midshipmen.

In 1920 it was decided that the opportunity should be afforded to a small percentage of the officers who had entered the Navy from civil life during the war period to continue in the service. Competitive examinations were held for those officers who were not graduates of the Naval Academy in order to ascertain those to whom the privilege should be given. This group of World War officers were assured that those who were successful and who were selected for permanent commissions would be certain of a career in the Navy.

It is interesting to note that a law at that time specifically stated that none of these officers should be retired involuntarily until they had served for a minimum of 10 years in the grade of lieutenant commander. A large number of World War officers competed in the examinations. When the results were finally announced there were approximately 800 officers passed upon as fitted in all respects and entitled to permanent commissions in the Regular Navy. Some of these men have continued in the service from that day on. They were men who responded when the need was the greatest. They were men who were prompted to offer their service solely because of an urgent call of duty. They were men in most instances whose induction into the service had little of the glamour attending a graduation exercise in the Naval Academy. Their induction was not a holiday occasion.

The first selection law for naval officers was enacted in 1916. Because of our entry into the World War the following year, the 1916 act was practically held in abeyance. An examination of the Navy list in 1920 is an interesting study. One finds, for instance, that the officers of the Navy were listed in accordance with seniority; that is, in 1915 exactly in the order in which they graduated and followed by the 1916, the 1917, and 1918 classes. The graduates of the Naval Academy in 1918 are followed by a group of World War officers, approximately 200 in number. The Naval Academy class of 1919 follows. After this class another group of World War officers appears, approximately 500 in number. Thereafter the class of 1920 from the Naval Academy takes its place, after which a few World War officers are found, the remainder of the World War group.

World War conditions and the building program of 1916 resulted in the induction of a larger number of officers from 1917 to 1924 than had ever been brought into the service before.

The Navy Register, dated June 1, 1934, shows that the number of officers that entered the service between 1917 and 1924 was larger than all the other officers in the Navy, that is, officers who were in the Navy before the war and officers who had come into the Navy after the war. This has been commonly referred to as the "hump." In an effort to eliminate the "hump," a selection law was passed in 1934 which extended selection down below the grade of lieutenant commander. Nothing of this kind had existed before in the Navy. The first group of officers to be affected by this legislation were the officers who had entered during the World War. This may have been accidental. It looks much as though it were by design. Prior to that time all the officers on reaching the top of the lieutenants' list were automatically promoted to the grade of lieutenant commander. But the 1934 law made drastic changes. The group of World War officers were subjected to selection, or, shall I say, to elimination. This selection or elimination process was carried out so drastically among the World War officer group that only 15 out of each 100 officers whose names appeared before the board were cited for promotion to the next higher rank. Contrast this, if you will, with the automatic promotion that the World War officers had a right to expect would continue. Careers went up in smoke.

It is safe to say that partial admission at least was made in 1934 that this elimination process was necessary to get rid of the "hump." Frantic efforts were made to justify the legislation. Every excuse, real and imaginary, was seized upon as a reason for the need for the legislation. The longer the excuses continued and the louder they became the more grotesque they appeared. War games fell into second place as the high Navy command sought to defend the elimination process. Most fair-minded men admit today that grave injustices and irreparable harm were done as a result of the 1934 act. Fitted officers, capable officers, splendid officers, were eliminated that should have continued to give to the country the benefits of their training and experience.

Dissatisfaction was rampant throughout the officer personnel of the Navy. But in most instances officers were reluctant to venture an expression of opinion lest their indiscretions in this respect might be charged against them. It is known that appeals were made to the Navy Department. Congress heard the complaints. Demands were made and insisted upon that something must be done to correct the mistakes and overcome the objections to the legislation. Unsigned communications from naval officers in all parts of the country were received protesting against the provisions of the 1934 act. Not only those who were affected but those who would be affected in the future were apprehensive. They naturally wondered what their future would be. They saw officers with excellent records, who had served during the war and immediately after the war, involuntarily separated from the service. Officers with letters of commendation from superiors, officers with exemplary records, fell by the wayside. A feeling of insecurity permeated the whole service.

The demand for correction finally brought about some concessions. Hearings were held. The 1938 bill was enacted. It had some redeeming features. It had glaring defects. The one redeeming feature that I might comment on is the fact that it retained in the service for some years officers who would probably have been retired under the old law. While the shortcomings of the bill were recognized by many who have made a study of the problem, it was not until after it had been put into practice that the mistakes were acknowledged. The 1939 amendments are therefore before us.

I wish to direct the attention of the House at this time to one feature in the 1938 law, and which is not corrected by the amendment now before us, which certainly is untenable and unreasonable. It may surprise many of you to know that the class of 1910 becomes junior to the class of 1911. The 1917 and 1918 men—that is, the World War men—become junior to the Naval Academy graduates of 1919, but worst of all the World War officers who were commissioned in 1917, 1918, and 1919 were made junior to officers who had graduated from the Naval Academy in 1925. The result of this is that we find upon the Navy list today officers who were serving at sea as commissioned officers in the trying days of 1917 and 1918 now junior to officers who first went to sea in 1925. The demoralizing effect of such a condition is apparent to all. The amendment which I have offered is intended to correct this situation. The situation must be corrected if morale is to be maintained.

The purpose of the amendment which I have offered is to correct the injustices now visited upon the World War men. I have a most profound respect and regard for the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee. He had charge of last year's bill. He is familiar with the provisions that affect adversely the World War men of the Navy. I believe he would like to correct the condition that exists. The World War men are behind the Naval Academy classes of 1918 and 1919 under existing law. If I am in error, I wish the chairman of the committee would correct me.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I will say to the gentleman that I am unable to comment as to the correctness of the gentleman's statement, because I do not have the information.

Mr. DITTER. Will not the gentleman be gracious enough to concur with me? I respect the gentleman's opinion. He knows the selection law from A to Z. He certainly knows what the provisions of this present bill are. If I were making an inaccurate statement, I am convinced the gentleman would challenge me. I therefore assume that I have the happy privilege of having his concurrence.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. If some Member of the House were on his feet correcting every misstatement of every gentleman, someone would be on the floor all the time; so I am letting the gentleman make his statement in his own way.

Mr. DITTER. I paid my compliments to the gentleman. I do have a profound respect for his intimate knowledge of the dotting of every "i" and the crossing of every "t" in the present selection bill. If my statement with reference to the World War men were inaccurate, I know the gentleman would correct me.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I stated to the gentleman that I did not know, but I would assume his statement was correct.

Mr. DITTER. The same situation prevails with that group which came in in 1919; the same with 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, and 1924. That group of officers is at the present time in back of the 1925 class from the Naval Academy. The purpose of my present amendment is to clear up those conditions.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. As I understood the gentleman's amendment in the section he has referred to, it relates to the promotion list—officers placed on the promotion list; is that correct?

Mr. DITTER. That is correct.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman's amendment proposes to place them from the date of their commissioned service instead of as the law now provides?

Mr. DITTER. That is all. In other words, to let them go along according to the date of their original commission in the Navy. In view of the gentleman's very gracious and generous treatment of the other amendments that have been offered, I feel confident he will do the same with this amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I will say that I had not thought about any injustice ever having been done that group of officers. Of course, no one wants to do any injustice to officers who came in as a result of the war and received a commission. As far as I am concerned, pending further study following the enactment of the bill, I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment coming in, but I cannot say what will be the outcome of it after some study is made of the subject matter.

Mr. DITTER. Then I assume the gentleman will accept the suggested amendment?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. For the time being, and let it go into the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments, the Committee will rise, under the terms of the resolution.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES of Texas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4929) to amend the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 944), pursuant to House Resolution 170, he reported the same back with sundry amendments adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 4852) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, for printing in the RECORD.

DETENTION OF CERTAIN ALIENS PENDING GRANT OF PASSPORTS

Mr. COLMER, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following report (Rept. No. 498), to accompany House Resolution 175, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

House Resolution 175

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 5643, a bill to invest the circuit courts of appeals of the United States with original and exclusive jurisdiction to review the order of detention of any alien ordered deported from the United States whose deportation or departure from the United States is not effectuated within 90 days after the date the warrant of deportation shall have become final; to authorize such detention orders in certain cases; to provide places for such detention; and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein an article which appeared in a Washington paper of today.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AVIATION CADETS IN NAVAL AND MARINE CORPS RESERVES

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 171.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 171

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 5765, a bill to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves upon completion of training, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Michigan desire any time on the rule?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I have no request for time, and there is no opposition to the rule on this side of the aisle.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in view of the adoption of the rule I ask unanimous consent that the bill made in order thereby, H. R. 5765, to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves upon completion of training, and for other purposes, may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Naval Aviation Reserve Act of 1939."

SEC. 2. Aviation cadets may, if qualified after completion of training, be commissioned ensigns in the Naval Reserve or second lieutenants in the Marine Corps Reserve.

SEC. 3. Ensigns or second lieutenants commissioned pursuant to this act may, after 3 years of service as such and if found qualified after such examinations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe, be commissioned lieutenants (junior grade) in the Naval Reserve or first lieutenants in the Marine Corps Reserve, respectively: Provided, That the active duty of aviation cadets subsequent to completion of their active duty while undergoing training shall be counted as such service for the purposes of promotions authorized by this section.

SEC. 4. All members of a class of aviation cadets entering the naval service at approximately the same time shall be deemed, for all purposes of this act, to have commenced their commissioned service on the same date.

SEC. 5. Officers commissioned pursuant to this act may be employed on active duty in time of peace only during the 7-year period next following the completion of their duty as aviation cadets undergoing training, except that such officers may be ordered to active duty thereafter for the purpose of instructing and training members of the Naval Reserve and the Marine Corps Reserve.

SEC. 6. When officers, commissioned pursuant to this act, are released from active duty that has been continuous for a period of 4 or more years, including active duty both as aviation cadets and as commissioned officers, they shall be paid a lump sum of $500 in addition to any pay and allowances which they may otherwise be entitled to receive, except as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 7. Government life insurance issued in accordance with section 5 of the act of April 15, 1935 (34 U. S. C., 846), shall continue when an aviation cadet is commissioned pursuant to this act; the premiums thereon shall be deducted from the pay of the officers concerned and paid by the Secretary of the Navy to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. When released from active duty or discharged they shall have the option of continuing such insurance at their own expense.

SEC. 8. Aviation cadets, who have completed active training duty on the date of this act and who may be commissioned pursuant thereto, may elect, when so commissioned, to receive the pay and allowances authorized by section 2 of the act of April 15, 1935 (49 Stat. 157; 34 U. S. C. 843), for aviation cadets while on active duty not undergoing training in lieu of the pay and allowances authorized by section 7 of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938 (52 Stat. 1176; 34 U. S. C. 853e). In such case they shall be paid a lump sum of $1,000 upon the completion of 4 years' active duty, and a further lump sum of $500 upon release from active duty thereafter whenever occurring; and in such case the premiums on the Government life insurance shall continue to be paid as provided in section 5 of the act of April 15, 1935 (49 Stat. 157; 34 U. S. C. 846), until such persons have completed 4 years of active duty, including active duty both as aviation cadets and as commissioned officers; thereafter such premiums shall be deducted and paid as provided in section 7 of this act.

SEC. 9. Pay and allowances of officers commissioned pursuant to this act shall be paid from appropriations for "Pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel" and "Pay, Marine Corps," except for those officers ordered to active duty pursuant to authority contained in the exception in section 5 of this act the pay and allowances of whom shall be paid from appropriations for "Naval Reserve" and "Pay, Marine Corps."

SEC. 10. No back pay or allowances shall be held to have accrued under this act prior to its enactment.

SEC. 11. When first commissioned pursuant to this act, officers shall be paid a uniform allowance of $150, provided they have not already received the uniform allowance of $150 authorized to be paid to aviation cadets upon their first assignment to duty after completion of training, and as provided in section 3 of the act of April 15, 1935 (49 Stat. 157; 34 U. S. C. 844).

SEC. 12. (a) Section 1 of the act of April 15, 1935 (49 Stat. 156; 34 U. S. C. 842), is hereby amended by deleting therefrom the last sentence.

(b) Section 3 of the act of April 15, 1935 (49 Stat. 157; 34 U. S. C. 844), is hereby amended by deleting therefrom the last sentence.

(c) Section 6 of the act of April 15, 1935 (49 Stat. 157; 34 U. S. C. 847), is hereby repealed.

(d) The first proviso of section 5 of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938 (52 Stat. 1176; 34 U. S. C. 853c) is hereby amended to read as follows: "Provided, That aviation cadets and officers commissioned pursuant to authority contained in the Naval Aviation Reserve Act of 1939 may be required to serve on active duty for a continuous period of 4 years from date of appointment as aviation cadets."

(e) Section 302 of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938 (52 Stat. 1180; 34 U. S. C. 855a) is hereby amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a colon and adding the following proviso: "And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to officers commissioned pursuant to authority contained in the Naval Aviation Reserve Act of 1939."

With the following committee amendments:

Pages 3 and 4, strike out section 8 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 8. Aviation cadets who have completed active duty undergoing training on the date of approval of this act and who may be commissioned pursuant thereto shall, upon completion of 4 years' active duty, be paid a lump sum determined as $1,000 minus the excess of the pay and allowances received by them prior to the date of such completion of duty over the pay and allowances, with which shall be included Government paid insurance premiums, which they would have received as aviation cadets had they not been commissioned. No person shall be held to be indebted to the United States as a result of the provisions of this section. Payments authorized by this section shall be in addition to that authorized by section 6 of this act."

Pages 5 and 6, strike out lines 23, 24, and 25 on page 5 and down to and including line 4 on page 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 13. Section 10 of the Naval Reserve Act of 1938 (52 Stat. 1178; 34 U. S. C. 853h), shall be applicable to the procurement and training of aviation cadets and of officers of the Naval Reserve and Marine Corps Reserve commissioned pursuant to this act. The minimum numerical strength to be achieved in aviation officers of the Reserves is set at 6,000.

"SEC. 14. The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a board of officers of the Navy and Marine Corps to investigate and report upon all matters concerning the Regular and Reserve aviation personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps. The board shall make such recommendations, including recommendations regarding the enactment of permanent legislation, as it deems appropriate and justified concerning the subject matter herein referred to. The Secretary of the Navy is further directed to cause the report of the board herein authorized to be transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives within 10 days of the beginning of the session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, commencing on or about January 3, 1940."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, in this Congress the Naval Affairs Committee has brought in bills which have been enacted into law for the betterment of the Navy, for its increase to provide an adequate first line of defense for the Nation.

We have authorized the increase of the ships and the planes of the Navy, and we have changed the personnel laws so that we might avoid the wastage of qualified officers which was impending under the prior promotion law. Now this bill provides for another of the necessities of the Navy—a proper supply of experienced naval aviators.

It does not inaugurate a new system, but it extends and enlarges an existing system.

Four years ago, when it became apparent that enough officer aviators could not be obtained from the commissioned line of the Navy to man the increasing aviation forces of the fleet, the aviation cadet system was instituted. By this system young men of intelligence, education, and ambition could apply for aviation service in the Navy. On their volunteering they were checked for their adaptability to aviation by a brief 30 days' test training and after they had demonstrated satisfactory qualifications therein were sent to the Naval Air Station at Pensacola for a year's intensive course. On acceptance for this course at Pensacola they were required to sign up to serve for 4 years and were given the rank of aviation cadets. Upon graduation from the training course they were to serve in the fleet for the remainder of their 4 years and then to be discharged with a discharge payment of $1,500 in order to furnish them with a proper capital to begin their civil life. As aviation cadets they were in the Naval Reserve, and after the completion of their 4 years' service they were to be offered a commission as ensign in the Naval Reserve but were not to be continued on active duty therein.

The response to this opportunity by the young men of the Nation has been most gratifying. Many more applications have been received than could be accepted. Most of the aviation cadets who have been enrolled have been college graduates. They have made excellent naval aviators and their service in the fleet has supplied the deficiency in aviators which otherwise would have seriously hampered the development of naval aviation and would have weakened the preparedness of the Navy for emergency.

There are, in round numbers, about 1,000 of these cadets now—778 in active service after training and nearly 300 under training. The first year's class entering in 1935–36, after the inauguration of the system, is about to complete its 4 years, and, under the law, to be discharged.

On graduation from Pensacola they were competent flyers, but now after 3 years' service in the fleet they are experienced naval aviators, and with the expanding aviation forces of the Navy their services are of such value that adequate opportunity and inducement should be offered to them to continue.

This bill provides that opportunity and inducement. It recognizes their abilities and the value of their services by granting them a commission on graduation from Pensacola instead of awaiting the completion of their entire 4 years' service. It grants them a promotion at the end of this 4 years' service, and with this increased rank and pay permits them to serve 4 years longer. It does not require them to sign up for this additional 4 years, or for any part thereof, since they have discharged the obligation to the Government implied in their receipt of an extensive training course by their service of 3 years in the fleet; but we hope, and the Navy Department believes, that a large proportion of them will voluntarily extend their services beyond their obligated period.

There have been statements in the press that the Army and the Navy would outbid each other for aviation cadet material in order each the better to supply the needs of its expanded aviation branches. This is not, however, an attempt to outbid the Army, but simply duplicates the provisions of their recent laws with regard to aviation cadets. As in the Army, the Navy aviation cadet on graduating from his training is commissioned in the Reserve.

In both services a total period of active duty of 7 years after graduation is allowed. In both services a discharge payment at any time after 4 years' service of $500 is allowed. This payment is reduced from the old $1,500 allowed the aviation cadet, because now, with his commission received immediately after graduation, he will during his 3 years' active service receive considerably higher pay than before.

With these comments I think that the bill may be readily understood. To survey it rapidly, however:

Section 2 provides for the commissioning of aviation cadets on graduation from flight training at Pensacola or elsewhere.

Section 3 provides for their promotion in rank to the next higher grade after 3 years' active duty, and in a proviso accredits the active duty of present-day aviation cadets toward this 3 years in order that they may be on a par with subsequent appointees.

Section 4 is purely administrative and allows the graduation of a group at the same time, irrespective of minor differences due to illness or brief delay for one reason or another.

Section 5 limits the active service of these officers after training to 7 years, except that they may be employed thereafter to train other flyers of the Naval Reserve.

Section 6 provides for the $500 discharge payment after 4 years' active duty.

Section 7 requires the continuation of Government life insurance, now prepaid by the Government for the aviation cadet, but thereafter, because of their increased pay and allowances, to be paid for by the officers themselves.

Section 8 as amended makes a discount for those aviation cadets who are now about to complete their service and who may under the law anticipate a $1,500 discharge payment. Obviously, if they have but a few weeks or months yet to do on their 4 years' service, the increased pay and allowances which they would receive by virtue of their new commissioned status would not make up for the loss of $1,000 now that the discharge payment is reduced by the bill to $500. Consequently this section provides an appropriate method of computing the payment to see that they suffer no loss because of the enactment of the bill.

Section 9 makes an appropriate change in the allocation of the charges for these officers in the fleet from the Naval Reserve appropriation to the appropriation which is now responsible for the personnel of the operating Navy.

Sections 10, 11, and 12 are of minor nature and are explained fully in the report.

Section 13 assures that the requirement of the Naval Reserve Act that the Reserve shall be built up to strength by equal annual increments during the next 10 years is applicable also to this group of officers of the Naval Reserve. It sets a minimum goal at 6,000 Reserve aviators.

Section 14 requires an investigation and report on the aviation personnel situation of the Navy by the convening of the next Congress in order that any further recommendations for legislation which may develop after a further study may be available for the Congress.

I believe that enactment of this bill will represent a major benefit to the Navy in providing for sufficient skilled aviators properly to man its increasing aviation forces, and the committee earnestly recommends its enactment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on the bill just passed and also on the bill H. R. 4929.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio speech delivered last Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House heretofore made, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is recognized for 20 minutes.

TRADE TREATIES

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, my remarks today are in part prompted by recent speeches made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. KITCHENS] in reference to my attitude toward the trade-treaty program and the tariff in general.

From time to time the House has listened to speeches made in defense of the trade-treaty program, in which its proponents have purported to answer the charges made against the program by myself and others.

In many instances these speeches in defense of the program had all the earmarks of having been prepared by the State Department's propaganda machine, which has been flooding the country with one-sided and frequently misleading information about the trade treaties and their effects.

It has been my observation that all those who have risen to the defense of the program have had some selfish interest in a particular treaty, which possibly has resulted to some advantage to an export product of their district. I except the gentleman from Mississippi from this category, because, as we all know, he is in a class by himself when it comes to the tariff.

Most Democrats regard the tariff as a local issue. They favor tariffs on the products of their own districts but are opposed to tariffs on anyone else's products. The gentleman from Mississippi is perfectly consistent—he is against tariffs on anything.

In the course of a number of speeches I have made on the subject of trade treaties I have referred to certain fundamental criticisms of the program. In all the replies that have been made to those speeches by trade-treaty proponents I have noted that they never try to answer any of the fundamental criticisms.

They take up certain minor points, which have no bearing on the real issues involved, and try to throw up a smoke screen which will distract attention from the basic objections to the program.

One of my purposes in addressing the House today is to set forth a few of these fundamental objections and to challenge the proponents of the trade-treaty program to answer them directly and without equivocation. Let me enumerate a few of these fundamental objections to the trade-treaty program which I have in mind:

FUNDAMENTAL OBJECTION NO. 1

The trade-treaty program involves an unconstitutional delegation of the tariff- and treaty-making powers of Congress by giving to the executive department discretionary legislative authority in reducing tariff duties and in entering into foreign trade treaties without Senate ratification.

If the Executive is not to be governed by any legislative rule or formula in making tariff concessions, the trade treaties should be subject to congressional approval.

And that has been a fundamental objection to the trade-treaty program from the start on the part of myself and others who think as I do on the subject. Inasmuch as the trade agreements involve the revenue, the House of Representatives should have a voice in their ratification, as well as the Senate.

FUNDAMENTAL OBJECTION NO. 2

By encouraging the importation of competitive foreign products, the trade-treaty program runs contrary to the basic purpose of foreign trade, which is to exchange our surplus products for the products of other lands which we need but do not produce ourselves.

That applies particularly at the present time to the recently negotiated treaty with Great Britain under which the rates on many articles have been changed—rates on products we can and do manufacture ourselves here in this country with American labor under American living conditions and an American scale of wages. Foreign articles are being brought into this country in direct competition with our own manufactured goods.

It is neither fair nor of any net benefit to this country to sacrifice certain industries and certain workers to the ravages of foreign competition in the mere hope of securing increased foreign markets for the products of some other American industry or group of workers.

The American market is the birthright of our own people, and they should be allowed to produce the goods consumed therein to the extent of their capacity to do so.

FUNDAMENTAL OBJECTION NO. 3

By permitting tariff reductions below the amount of duty necessary to offset foreign cost-of-production advantages, and thereby subjecting our home producers to unfair competition from the cheap products of other lands, the trade-treaty program drives our home producers out of business, takes jobs away from our workers, depresses our price structure, and undermines our American wage and living standards.

The rate structure under the Tariff Act of 1930 was built up not for the purpose of placing an embargo on foreign goods but only to equalize competitive conditions in the home market as between foreign and domestic producers. If any of the rates are too high or are inadequate, they can be adjusted under the so-called flexible tariff provisions after a finding by the Tariff Commission as to the amount of duty required to exactly offset the foreign cost-of-production advantage.

All we ask is the difference between the foreign cost of production, which is very low, and our own. I for one will stand back of the American producer, the American laborer, and American living conditions as against foreign competition. We ought to have a duty that will accomplish that.

FUNDAMENTAL OBJECTION NO. 4

Under the treaty program, the concessions which we make to a particular country in return for concessions from that country are extended generally to the whole world, save Germany alone, without requiring these other countries to give us reciprocal concessions in return, and despite the fact that in many instances such other countries actively discriminate against American products.

FUNDAMENTAL OBJECTION NO. 5

The negotiation of the trade treaties is carried on in an arbitrary and high-handed manner. The only opportunity American producers have to be heard on a proposed treaty is before its actual negotiation takes place, and then only before a "buffer" committee which has nothing whatever to do with the actual negotiations.

The terms of a treaty are never made known until after it has actually been signed by the President and thus been made binding on this country.

If that is the American method of writing laws, I would rather see some other system adopted.

Of course, many other objections to the present trade-treaty program could be raised, but I believe its proponents will have their hands full if they can satisfactorily answer the few that I have enumerated. I know these gentlemen will do me the honor of endeavoring to answer them, but whether they can do it satisfactorily or not remains to be seen when they either take the floor or ask to address the House for 1 minute and then extend their remarks and fill up a couple of pages in the RECORD.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am sure the House will be interested in having the gentleman from Massachusetts tell the membership something about the effects the Cuban treaty has had upon Puerto Rico, as was testified to before the Ways and Means Committee several weeks ago by Gov. Blanton Winship and Dr. Gruening.

Mr. TREADWAY. That was a very interesting hearing that we had to which the gentleman from Minnesota refers, and it is a matter of record in the social-security hearings before the Ways and Means Committee.

I was very much astonished, and I am sure the gentleman from Minnesota was also, at the testimony given of the serious and deleterious effect of the trade-treaty program on Puerto Rico and its industries. If the gentleman cares to have it repeated, I shall be glad to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting some of the testimony given by officials of Puerto Rico.

Mr. KNUTSON. Especially as it affects pineapples and embroidery.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; I shall be very happy to insert that testimony.

Governor Winship testified as follows:

Mr. REED. You say that the wage and hour bill and the reciprocal-trade treaties have affected that industry.

Governor WINSHIP. Yes sir; that industry a year and a half ago was $21,000,000 a year. It has dropped to half that at the present time and is threatened with extinction.

Mr. REED. Will you tell us how it is adversely affected?

Governor WINSHIP. In this way: With reference to the tariffs, the reciprocal-trade agreement with Switzerland, for instance, in considering her needlework industry, was given a special tariff rate, and under the most-favored-nation clause the tariff concession on hand-made handkerchiefs was extended to Japan and China and every other country in which there are low wages. In discussing this problem some time ago before the Committee for Reciprocity Information that the State Department had convened, for the purpose of a hearing on that subject, I said to them, "Before you put into effect the Wages and Hours Act you ought to put something into effect that will protect these people who are going to work under the Wages and Hours Act and give them an opportunity to compete with the people on the other side."

Mr. REED. That is, the wage and hour legislation has thrown the wages to a higher point, so that they cannot compete with the other countries?

Governor WINSHIP. The Federal Wages and Hours Act proposed for Puerto Rico wages at a minimum of 25 cents an hour; the Swiss trade agreement, which extends to China and Japan, under the most-favored-nations clause, the right to come under the provisions of that agreement, brought products in from there that were made at 5 and 6 cents a day for labor, and we are required to pay 25 cents an hour.

Gentlemen, there may have been some great consideration on our part for poor China and all her troubles, and so forth, but at the present time Japan holds that very area that produces these goods, and Japan is getting the benefit of these Swiss agreement concessions at the present time. Importations have continued to come in on account of the fact that Japan is holding all of that area, and you know that Japan will make China pay "through the nose" for all those different things, and get the benefits that might otherwise have gone to the poor Chinese laborers over there.

Mr. REED. I assume that would be true, but I am just wondering if that is temporary, and if the war has relieved it to any extent.

Governor WINSHIP. The proposition is that day by day our needlework industry, and particularly our handkerchief industry, is growing smaller, and we are getting more and more people to feed down there, and this summer and next winter we are going to have six or seven hundred thousand people to look after, and we are trying to provide for them.

The following is from Dr. Gruening's testimony:

Mr. KNUTSON. Let me ask you this: Have any of the reciprocal-trade agreements we have made been felt in Puerto Rico?

Dr. GRUENING. Yes, sir; they have.

Mr. KNUTSON. Which one?

Dr. GRUENING. The Cuban treaty in particular; the British treaty and the Swiss treaty.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would be glad if you will give us a few details of that.

Dr. GRUENING. Puerto Rico had a flourishing pineapple industry and we were all very much pleased with this industry, because it had all the factors that a crop needed in Puerto Rico, uniquely so; it competed with no crop on the American mainland or Territorial market—it didn't even compete with the Hawaiian pineapple, which is of a different type and used for canning—Puerto Rico's was a crop of fresh pineapple and sold chiefly along the Atlantic seaboard. It had the second advantage that it was hurricane-proof. A crop like coffee, if a hurricane hits it, is not merely lost for that year but for several years—other crops are also injured by hurricanes, but pineapples are hurricane proof. It is a small man's crop. A fellow could go out and grow pineapples on half an acre or on 1 or 2 acres, so that it was desirable, both economically and socially. In the Cuban Treaty the differential was so lowered that the Puerto Rican pineapple industry is being put out of business.

I appeared before the Committee on Trade Agreements and made an emphatic protest against this differential and appealed to them that Puerto Rico's pineapple industry be protected in the revision of the Cuban agreement, but apparently they were determined to consider tropical products from the standpoint of benefiting Cuba. We don't know yet how this new pending agreement is coming out, but we are very fearful it will contain further discriminations against Puerto Rico.

The British treaty agreement lowered the tariff on coconuts from $2.50 to $5 a hundred. That was not a tremendous thing in appearance, but actually it means that the low-wage regions such as Jamaica and the Bahamas, and all the competing British islands in the Caribbean, can send in their coconuts at a price which the Puerto Ricans cannot meet.

The Swiss agreement made a reduction in needlework which very seriously injured the needlework industry. That is more or less academic now, because the wage and hour bill has completely flattened out the needlework industry. But it seems to me rather tragic that when we were casting about, making every effort to find some crop for Puerto Rico that would not be limited by quota, such as sugar is, not destroyed by hurricane, such as coffee, not destroyed by some other factor or by competition which they could not meet, such as the citrus-fruit competition of Florida and Texas, which naturally prevents Puerto Rico citrus fruits from amounting to much, with the high cost of transportation—we developed pineapples and found a crop that was supported and would have increasingly supported a great many thousands of people. Now it has been ruined by the Cuban Treaty.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ROMJUE). Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Is it a fact that the gentleman from Minnesota still owns a pineapple plantation in Haiti?

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman has answered for himself, but in any event the gentleman from Minnesota is extremely familiar with the conditions that have existed in the islands even since he became a member of the Committee on Ways and Means succeeding his labors as chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman will recall the promises that were made back in 1932, and one of the first things that the new administration said they would do upon taking office would be to repeal the so-called iniquitous Smoot-Hawley bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I notice no effort has been made to do so. The reason, I understand, is because they looked into it and found it would bring absolute chaos in this country were that done.

Mr. TREADWAY. Let me ask the gentleman if that is the only pledge made in the campaign of 1932 that has been forgotten since that time? All you have to do is to look at the platform of the Democratic Party at that time and put a zero mark after every item that appears there. [Applause.]

All we hear in reference to the tariff act is that the rates are too high, but no one brings in evidence to show the effect that they claim.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Our own Government paid the American holders of gold and gold certificates $20.67 an ounce. Since that time the Government has bought about $8,000,000,000 worth of foreign gold for which it paid $35 an ounce. While they do not believe in our protective tariff for American industry they certainly do believe in the policy of paying a subsidy and a high subsidy for foreign industries, do they not?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes. Not only that, but they have put into effect that same policy again by legislation passed last week. They want to continue this beneficial treatment of foreign gold owners and foreign countries. They buy gold at a high price for our Government, to be stored down in the hills in the neighborhood of where the gentleman resides, and he knows what mighty little use it is put to down there. I do not believe he has seen much of it in circulation in his neighborhood. If he has, it has not percolated up here.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Not a dollar, and they are in bad shape all around that country.

Mr. TREADWAY. We are getting in worse shape all the time, not only on account of our gold purchases but on account of our silver purchases. I believe in paying a fair price for the things we purchase, but why pay double? Why does Uncle Sam have to pay practically double for that gold and newly mined silver?

Mr. KNUTSON. Uncle Sam paid double to the international bankers for their gold, too, but he did not do so to American citizens.

Mr. TREADWAY. What about silver?

Mr. KNUTSON. That is almost as bad.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I feel highly honored at the presence of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. KITCHENS] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Do not forget there are also three Republicans here.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not need them. If as a result of my talk this afternoon I can convince two such men as the gentleman from Arkansas and the gentleman from Mississippi with reference to the demerits of the trade-treaty program, I would have considered my day as mighty well spent; but whether I can accomplish that purpose or not, I am going to keep hammering at this proposition, because it is an iniquitous law and ought to be taken off the statute books. I hope the gentlemen will come along with me.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY. May I ask the gentleman this question: As long as our exports of agricultural products stand at 25 percent and the importations of agricultural products stand at 50 percent, we are justified, are we not, in saying that the farmer is being crucified on the altar of world commerce?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is another expression for one I used more than a year ago on the same general subject when I frequently referred in the course of my remarks to the fact that the farmer had been "sold down the river."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Has the gentleman made any remarks with reference to the trading of cotton and its relationship to the provisions of that deal being contrary to the reciprocal-trade agreement program?

Mr. TREADWAY. I discussed that on another occasion. I am only dealing with a few fundamental objections to the trade-treaty program at the present time. Later on I shall take a few minutes of my time to bring up another subject matter. I am afraid I will not have time to go into that matter again.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. We have heard much about the New Deal and up-to-date policies. I see we are now working on a proposition of barter.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I should like to know how new it is to the world to have to exchange goods for goods.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is not a new proposition. I made a few remarks on that subject a week or so ago which did not quite seem to satisfy some of our friends on the Democratic side, but I cannot be responsible for their viewpoint, you know.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Going back to the question I raised a moment ago, does not the gentleman believe it would be sound for the Government, insofar as it is going to hold commodities, to reduce its long position on cotton and strengthen its short position on other commodities, even though this does run contrary to the reciprocal-trade agreement program? Does not the gentleman believe this would be a good policy for the Government to follow?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do; and if the gentleman is advocating it I shall be here to listen to the speech he will make on the subject.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to say I am very much in favor of doing that very thing.

Mr. TREADWAY. I read only yesterday some comments on how liberal we are going to be toward cotton growers, paying them 2 cents a pound additional as a subsidy. The gentleman does not get an extra subsidy like that for his beet-sugar growers up in Michigan, does he?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Under the present sugar program there is a benefit which goes to the growers of sugar beets.

Mr. TREADWAY. But you are limited as to the quota you can have.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Oh, yes; very much limited. In other words, if they permitted stocks of sugar to pile up in the warehouses as cotton has piled up, and then in addition to giving soil conservation and special benefit payments, exported that sugar to other countries and at the same time furnished an additional subsidy to all growers, you would have a situation somewhat similar to what applies on cotton. It seems to me the administration is very sound in reducing its long position in cotton and strengthening its short position in other commodities, even though this does run contrary to the reciprocal-trade agreement program.

Mr. TREADWAY. If it runs contrary to the reciprocal-trade treaty program it certainly cannot be very agreeable to the Secretary of State, who is the father of the reciprocal-trade treaties.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I believe that is true; but it does show the difficulty the administration will continue to get into in attempting to administer the reciprocal-trade agreement program as heretofore followed.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not believe the gentleman from Michigan or I will be very seriously affected with sorrow if they get in difficulties in administering that program.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield very briefly, as I wish to discuss another subject.

Mr. KNUTSON. Touching on the subject the gentleman mentioned a minute ago, it is my recollection that Colonel Batista returned to Cuba on the 28th of November and gave out an interview to the effect that the Cuban trade agreement had been renewed, whereas as late as December 1 the State Department told inquirers that the matter was just undergoing examination.

Mr. TREADWAY. There was just a little discrepancy. They got their wires crossed in some way.

Mr. KNUTSON. There was a discrepancy of about 3 days.

Mr. TREADWAY. Last Monday there appeared in the press a statement given out by the minority leader [Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts] in which he outlined a suggested program for business recovery and reemployment. In my opinion it was an admirable program, and I am glad to endorse it.

One of the propositions laid down in this program was that there should be a special congressional committee appointed to study the effects of the trade-treaty program upon industry and agriculture. This suggestion is very timely, and I am today acting upon it by introducing a resolution for this purpose.

At the present time the trade-treaty program is entirely in the hands of the executive department. Despite the fact that Congress is charged, under the Constitution, with the full responsibility for fixing tariff rates, it has no say whatever as to any of the changes made under the trade treaties. There is no opportunity for ratification of the treaties by either branch of Congress.

Opposition to the treaty program has grown by leaps and bounds. The farmers of the country feel that they have been unjustly treated; and they have good ground for complaint.

Our manufacturers point to the difficulty of maintaining price and wage levels in the face of tariff reductions on competitive foreign products; and they have good ground for complaint.

Our workers feel that their jobs are being turned over to the cheap labor of Europe and the Orient; and they, too, have good cause for complaint.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HAWKS. Can the gentleman tell me why the League of Women Voters of the United States should be so heartily in favor of the trade treaties?

Mr. TREADWAY. I cannot answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. HAWKS. Does the gentleman receive, as I do, long letters in defense of the trade treaties?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAWKS. From the League of Women Voters?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not recall the source of them, but we certainly get plenty of them from various sources, and they are inspired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, may we have order in the rear of the Hall? There is too much conversation back yonder on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am delighted that the gentleman from Mississippi is eager to hear what I am saying.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman may say something directly, and if he does I should like to hear it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course, I am not to blame that the gentleman's skull is so impenetrable that it cannot be penetrated by facts and proof.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BENDER. The gentleman is making a fine statement and is saying a mouthful. I am sure some of our friends on the other side do not like to hear what is going into the RECORD and going to the people, who are getting some idea of why conditions are as bad as they are all over this country.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman for his statement.

As I previously stated, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] in his program suggests an investigation of the trade treaties and their effects by a congressional committee. I have today introduced a concurrent resolution setting up a joint committee of 10 Members of the House and Senate to carry on such an investigation. Under the terms of my resolution there would be three Members of the majority and two of the minority representing each branch.

The committee would be directed to make a full and complete study of the trade treaties and their economic effect upon domestic agriculture, labor, and industry. It would be authorized to go into such other matters in connection therewith as to at least four members of the committee may seem relevant and advisable.

The authority conferred by the resolution would expire January 3, 1940, when the committee would be expected to make a report of its findings, together with such recommendations for amendatory legislation as it might see fit to make. Of course, I do not know what the attitude of the administration would be toward such an investigation, but if it has nothing to hide it should welcome the inquiry. [Applause.]

I make this statement with the full expectation that it will be criticized, but we are entitled in this body to the information, and if the executive branch of the Government has no reason to conceal things in connection with these treaties, they ought to welcome the investigation which my resolution proposes.

I believe that there are many Members on the Democratic side who would like to see such an investigation made. It is the duty and responsibility of the Congress to find out what is being done under the treaty program.

Mr. SANDAGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. SANDAGER. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he might find out something about it if he would read some of the foreign newspapers. A newspaper from Calais, for instance, tells about the tremendous increase in their lace trade.

Mr. TREADWAY. To the detriment of the lace manufacturers in the gentleman's State.

Mr. SANDAGER. Eighty percent of their increased exports are to the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the Congress owes it to itself as well as to the people to find out the real facts. The inquiry should not be a partisan one, and it should not be a whitewashing proposition. Ample opportunity should be given to all groups affected by the treaty program to come before the committee and present their views.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman has expressed himself as being opposed to the trade agreements.

Mr. TREADWAY. Very strenuously, from the day they were first suggested to the Congress, and I do not hesitate to say so.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman tell us what the trade balance is at the present time, and in whose favor it is, and what it was when the present administration came into power?

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, how about the indebtedness that has been piled up under this administration?

Mr. HOUSTON. We are not talking about the N. R. A. or the indebtedness, but the trade treaties.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would it be proper for the gentleman to ask the gentleman from Kansas whether he wishes the item of munitions to be included?

Mr. HOUSTON. If we are going to talk about the C. C. C. camps or the organizations of that sort, that is another matter; but why not answer my question?

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman mean to include also the scrap iron shipped to Japan?

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to know what the trade balance is.

Mr. TREADWAY. I may say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] provides a lot of information along that line for the benefit of the House almost daily, and if he were present I am sure he could inform the gentleman, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania is always interested in how we are going to get the money to pay the bills that are being run up.

Mr. SANDAGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. SANDAGER. Is it not a fact that after we started to plow cotton under, and corn and so on, that we had to import some of those raw commodities for our own people?

Mr. TREADWAY. That is the object of the plowing up process and the object of the trade treaties, to bring goods into this country in competition with the products of New England and the entire United States, including even the South.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, I may say to my friend from Kansas that we do not need to be in doubt about these figures at all. Within the last 48 hours I have obtained them from the Department of Commerce. They release such figures every month, and I may say that I was startled when I read the last report that came to my desk yesterday morning showing the decline of the countries operating under reciprocal-trade treaties.

Mr. HOUSTON. Was not the balance favorable to the United States by about $1,000,000,000?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. But not because of increased exports. Rather, exports declined last year over 1937, but imports declined to an even greater extent.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include as a part of them a copy of the concurrent resolution to which I have referred and which I am now introducing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 20

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there is hereby established a Joint Committee on Trade Agreements (hereinafter referred to as the committee), to be composed of 10 members as follows:

(1) Five members who are members of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, three from the majority and two from the minority party, to be appointed by the President of the Senate; and

(2) Five members who are members of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, three from the majority and two from the minority party, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the committee—

(a) To make a full and complete study and investigation of the trade agreements entered into under the authority of the Reciprocal Tariff Act of 1934, as amended, with a view to determining (1) the economic effect of such trade agreements upon domestic agriculture, labor, and industry, and (2) such other matters in connection therewith as in the opinion of at least four members of the committee seem pertinent thereto.

(b) To report to the Congress not later than January 3, 1940, the result of its investigation, together with such recommendations for amendatory legislation as it shall see fit to make.

SEC. 3 (a) The committee shall meet and organize as soon as practicable after at least a majority of the members representing each branch of Congress shall have been appointed, and shall elect a chairman and a vice chairman from among its members, and shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of a secretary and such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants as it deems advisable. A vacancy on the committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the committee, and shall be filled in the same manner as the original selection.

(b) The committee is authorized to hold hearings and to sit and act at such places and times, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services in reporting such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. Subpenas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman or vice chairman.

(c) The committee is authorized to utilize the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government.

(d) The members of the committee shall serve without compensation for such service, but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the committee.

(e) The expenses of the committee shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers signed by the chairman or vice chairman.

(f) All authority conferred by this resolution shall expire on January 3, 1940.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the conclusion of the special orders for today, I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order, previously made, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] for 15 minutes.

RADIO

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, 2 weeks ago I called the attention of the House to the problem child of this administration, the Federal Communications Commission.

One of the outstanding necessities of our day, to my mind, is the elimination of monopolies. The Congress of the United States, by an almost unanimous vote at the last session, created a committee to investigate monopolies. During the past few weeks we have appropriated an additional sum of $600,000 to investigate monopolies. Yet there is no indication, so far as I can see, that the congressional Monopoly Investigating Committee has as yet recognized the fact that we have a problem child on our hands, namely, a radio monopoly with power and influence comparable to any monopoly which ever existed within our land.

It comes with poor grace for the Congress of the United States to preach that we are opposed to monopolies when we continue to permit a governmental agency, created and maintained through funds appropriated by the Congress, and the members of that agency, the Federal Communications Commission, who are representatives of the Congress, to create and sanction the continuance of the monopoly now existing in radio.

Radio grants or licenses are issued by the Federal Communications Commission with the limitation written into the law by the Congress that such licenses or grants shall be issued only when public interest, convenience, and necessity are served.

Surely, when those who hold such grants enter into contracts covering control of their facilities for periods in excess of the time for which the license is authorized by the Commission, whereby under such contracts control of the time of such station is granted or possessed by others located many miles away, it precludes the possibility of such radio station serving public interest, convenience, and necessity.

Some may say we have a Commission which, acting for the Congress of the United States under the powers delegated to it by the Congress, should and does prevent anyone other than the licensee operating the station. But I believe it would be fairer to say that were those controlling the Federal Communications Commission in reality representing the Congress of the United States or the people of the United States, or were these Commissioners free to act as their oath of office calls for, the complaints which I have just made would not exist.

However, facts are hard to get away from, and I venture to say to the Congress of the United States that when the Congress finally decides to have the long-needed congressional investigation of the Federal Communications Commission and the radio monopoly they will find, first, that the two monopolistic networks now in reality control some 350 radio stations; second, that through this control, because of these illegal contracts which they hold, in many cases all of the time of such affiliated stations is being used for such purposes as the network alone sees fit; and, third, it is the network stations which receive the vast profits in radio from radio advertising.

The Communications Act of 1934 and the regulations issued under such act specifically provide that a grantee shall not turn over control of a radio station to another without the written approval of the Federal Communications Commission.

The records of this problem child fail to show wherein the Federal Communications Commission has granted such written approval.

Yet the Federal Communications Commission knows officially that the contracts which the radio stations affiliated with the networks are forced to sign actually do turn over the control of time and programs of affiliated radio stations to such use as the radio monopolists see fit to put them to.

It is my understanding that there are many, many stations which today not only have assigned all of their time to the monopolistic networks but even of the radio time they have retained for themselves on the network stations. Their records will show that only some 5 percent of the time of these stations is used for broadcasting matters of interest to the community in which the radio station is located.

Despite these flagrant violations of law and open evasion of the regulations of the Federal Communications Commission, we find the members of the Federal Communications Commission apparently dumb or blind to what their own records reveal.

There are many additional complaints that can be made of the apparent malfeasance in office of those who control this Commission. There are many abuses which the Congress will sooner or later have to investigate.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman speaks of controlling the Commission. Who does control the Commission?

Mr. CONNERY. If the gentleman will refer back to the charges made during the last session of Congress before the Committee on Rules, when a resolution similar to the one which is now before the House, calling for an investigation of radio monopoly, was brought before that committee, together with the charges made there, it will be made clear to the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. I am in sympathy with the gentleman.

Mr. CONNERY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. But I am rather surprised that he should state that this Commission is controlled by somebody, and by such control is prevented from doing its duty.

Mr. CONNERY. I think if the gentleman will permit me to proceed, he will find that I shall go into that more fully as I go on, and the facts I will disclose will cover the matter that the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. I am pleased to yield to my friend from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. What has been done with the Communications Commission to clean house?

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, the Communications Commission has gone through the movements of conducting a so-called investigation, but that has been going on for several months, and, of course, it will end in the usual whitewash, for how can the Commission sincerely and honestly investigate itself?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman recalls that in the last independent offices appropriation bill the appropriation for that Commission was dispensed with entirely?

Mr. CONNERY. That is correct.

Mr. HOUSTON. Until they got through their housecleaning.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am on that subcommittee, and I have never been called in to consider the appropriation for 1940.

Mr. CONNERY. Does not that action by the Appropriations Committee in itself show lack of confidence in that Commission?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. PATRICK. Is not that suspension now in existence?

Mr. CONNERY. Does the gentleman mean this appropriation we have just been talking about?

Mr. PATRICK. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. Nothing has been done about that. There has been no appropriation made by the Congress so far for the coming year. The Committee on Appropriations, when considering appropriations for all the independent agencies for the coming year in the independent offices appropriation bill, refused to take any action. Not one cent has been appropriated for the Federal Communications Commission for 1939–40 for the year starting July 1, 1939.

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, the gentleman from Alabama seems to be confused about the appropriation. The appropriation to which I referred does not take effect until the fiscal year 1940.

Mr. CONNERY. No action has been taken either by the Committee or the House as yet with reference to the appropriation for the Federal Communications Commission for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1939, and that in itself to me shows the great contempt in which the Federal Communications Commission is held by the Committee and by the House, if not by the entire Congress, especially in view of the fact that not one complaint was made and not one voice was raised on the floor regarding the failure of the Committee to make that appropriation.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am very much in favor of the gentleman's resolution for a thorough investigation. In my district we have a situation where for 20 months they have been considering a matter. One faction wants to move a radio station into another community, and neither the opposition nor the proponents can find out anything of what has been going on down here, and almost 2 years have elapsed from the time they made the application.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman is just stating another case. Similar complaints are almost innumerable.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I do hope the gentleman will permit me to get on. I have very little time.

Mr. MICHENER. I hope this investigation will develop why Boake Carter was taken off the air.

Mr. CONNERY. Of course, I say frankly that I do not believe in censorship, but I do believe that a broadcaster given the privilege and the sole privilege of operating in a particular district should not himself be permitted to have his own views and editorial policies expressed over his station either by himself or through somebody subservient to him. I believe that is what the gentleman is hitting at.

It will interest the Members of the House to know that an important radio network recently so conducted its news and editorial policies, during a city election, that a very important Democratic newspaper, the Boston Post, editorially referred to the tactics used by these radio stations as the "hatchet men of the air."

Yet no action has been taken by the Federal Communications Commission, despite sworn charges that the stations referred to had contravened the law.

Incidentally, I want to say in answer to the question asked earlier by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] in case I do not have an opportunity to reply to him later, what I was really hitting at was that the Federal Communications Commission, to all intents and purposes, evidently is controlled by the big monopolistic owners of these radio chains. That is your answer right there. These conditions would not exist if that were not so.

I say with all sincerity, Mr. Speaker, that the sooner we investigate this radio problem the less corruption we will be confronted with later, because corruption having existed in this agency, I understand, since the early days of the control of radio by the Department of Commerce, it has grown like Banquo's ghost.

Records on file at the Federal Communications Commission will show that one of the dominant networks has, in its report to the Federal Communications Commission, openly charged off an average of $300,000 as an expenditure it made in acquiring the grants which they possess, or a total of about two and one-half millions of dollars.

Yet the Government receives nothing in the form of license fees for these invaluable franchises or grants from which a few had been enriched to the tune of many millions of dollars.

Mr. Speaker, there are today many indications of the gross mismanagement and abuse of trust on the part of those entrusted with control of large business enterprises. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains innumerable indictments of the mismanagement and the misuse of the funds of the radio monopoly. As to the influence of those who own these companies in contrast with the influence of those who manage these companies, the next stockholders' meeting of the radio monopolists should indicate whether or not additional legislation is necessary in order to properly protect the interests of the many thousands of small investors.

To my mind and from what the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows, it may be necessary that we enact legislation wherein the small investors may or the Government shall delegate from the lists of such investors representatives to participate in the management and protection of these enterprises.

In the case of radio I can cite to you several cases where men occupy large influence in the management of these companies and yet have nothing invested in the stock of the companies in which they have a powerful voice.

The Columbia Broadcasting System, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and from data furnished by the Securities and Exchange Commission, invested a total of some $1,600,000 in cash and now possesses a property which, when listed on the New York Stock Exchange some months ago, I understand, had a value, according to such listing, of some $60,000,000.

In addition the records of the Federal Communications Commission, as the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show, reveal innumerable instances wherein prices of from 10 to 20 times the value of the physical assets were paid in the transfer of one license or grant from one to another.

Another instance well worth consideration of the Congress is the sale of station KNX, with a physical valuation of something less than $200,000, acquired by the Columbia Broadcasting System for a price approved by the Federal Communications Commission of $1,250,000.

An outstanding instance of trafficking in radio licenses with the approval of the Commission is one concerning a property wherein it was specifically stated that the physical assets were to be junked, leaving nothing but the franchise to be sold, was sold for some $85,000.

An investigation of these transactions, to my mind, is well worth consideration of the Income Tax Division of the Treasury Department.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am not too familiar with this radio complication that the gentleman is talking about, but I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he has heard—and it is only rumor with me—of a recent entertainment that took place in some "hot spot" in New York City, where members of the Federal Communications Commission were present. They got into a drunken brawl, and in the brawl some woman was hurt—her arm twisted. I do not know whether it was the licensees who were giving the entertainment or whether it was members of the Federal Communications Commission, or who it was. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he knew about that?

Mr. CONNERY. I will say to the gentleman that I had heard that report; but not having verification, I did not intend to say anything about it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ROMJUE). Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASSINGALE. My further observation was simply going to be this: I am not interested in the Federal Communications Commission. I have nothing against them and do not know much about what has been going on; but it just occurs to me as an ordinary citizen, disconnected with my membership in Congress, that no real investigation of good can be had by sending out men of that type to investigate a monopoly in the radio business or any other commission in this Government of ours.

Mr. CONNERY. If the report which the gentleman mentions is true, and I will admit that I heard that rumor, I heartily agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Does not the gentleman think that rumor ought to be followed up and an inquiry made to see whether or not it is true?

Mr. CONNERY. Absolutely. And I think probably some of these things, if true, would be brought out by a congressional investigation. If you will remember, I took the floor of the House last year and protested that the projected investigation of radio by the Federal Communications Commission itself was absolutely ridiculous. In other words, Congress was giving to the Federal Communications Commission, to an agency of the Government, the privilege of investigating themselves. What could that result in but a whitewash? Furthermore, the gentleman will remember that on the day the monopoly-investigating resolution was brought into this House we were told, in answer to a question which was asked on that day, that this monopoly-investigating committee would cover the subject of radio. But, to the best of my knowledge, to date it has not even mentioned the subject, let alone look into it.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am sure the gentleman will agree with me; it would be similar, exactly, to an investigation of the Seventy-sixth Congress by appointing such men as the gentleman and myself and others to do the investigating of that Congress.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman is exactly right.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I think it is a serious matter and ought not be tolerated.

Mr. CONNERY. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Speaker, if I may go on and take advantage of the few minutes remaining, I would like to do so. I hope I am not holding up the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] too long.

I would like at this time to explore for the benefit of the Members of the House some of the many abuses of the Communications Act and the regulatory provisions of the Federal Communications Commission which have been permitted by the Commission in order that a few might profit at the expense of the many.

A few years ago some of the advertising element prevailed upon the Commission to issue a new form of license or grant for the use of so-called booster stations. A booster station is a grant in another community to a grantee already owning a radio station. A booster station is nothing but a series of wires and an amplifier transmitting the radio broadcasts from the mother station. The booster station provides practically no employment for those in the community wherein it is located. It does, however, succeed in diverting the advertising of that community from the local newspapers to these alleged radio stations.

The cost of operation of these booster stations is practically nil, and yet they serve the purpose of destroying the opportunities for expansion of newspapers owned by those who have invested their all in trying to properly represent and to reflect the views of their community.

In addition, these booster stations eliminate possibilities of employment in the publication of the newspapers with whom they most unfairly compete locally.

As an illustration of the unfair competition of the booster grants I have in mind, I cite such a booster station in my own congressional district where those not residing in the district, having little or no community interest in the district, and by methods and means the less said about the better, have acquired a booster station wholly and solely for the purpose of dollar profits and apparently with no thought of serving local public interest, convenience, and necessity.

This condition I complain of is not confined alone to my district. It exists in many other communities throughout the country to the detriment of those who seek to serve public interest, convenience, and necessity, and who provide jobs for the residents of those communities.

Like many other very apparent irregularities which exist through the connivance and incompetency of the Federal Communications Commission, it is my understanding that these booster-station grants were issued originally on the theory of experimentation—experimentation, however, with the grantees permitted to exploit the field covered and to most unfairly compete commercially with those who were dependent upon local advertising for their support.

Some may ask if conditions at the Federal Communications Commission have not improved in the past year, and my answer is unreservedly "No." It is common knowledge to the Members of the House, and a short time ago they indicated that knowledge that something was rotten when they declined to appropriate any money in the regular appropriation bill for the continued maintenance of this alleged governmental agency.

Some have asked, "Why is it that the Chairman of the Commission seems so friendly to the monopolist networks?" and, of course, I have no personal knowledge of the relationship which exists between the representatives of the monopolistic networks and the Chairman and other members of the Commission. But it might be of interest for the Members of the House to read the news story appearing in the February 15 issue of the Washington Times-Herald, which news story brings out the fact that down in North Carolina, the home of Chairman McNinch, a life-insurance company held a radio franchise or grant.

I learn from this news story that this life-insurance company sought to improve its ability to serve the local community. It asked the Federal Communications Commission for the privilege of broadcasting more hours during the day. However, under the rules of the Commission, the National Broadcasting Co. was privileged to and did oppose this company securing additional hours to broadcast during the day.

It is my understanding from this story that station WPTF, owned by the Durham Life Insurance Co., found it necessary to secure the consent of the National Broadcasting Co. before it could be privileged by the Federal Communications Commission to broadcast longer hours. To secure the consent of the National Broadcasting Co., I understand, it was forced to give an option to the National Broadcasting Co. for the sale of its entire radio facilities, this option to be exercised at the will of the National Broadcasting Co.

For some 2 or 3 years I understand this option lay dormant. Reading between the lines of this story, I take it that some bright mind in the radio monopoly possibly decided to curry favor with the Chairman of the Commission, and they have exercised their option to buy this radio station over the protest of the present owners of the station.

The National Broadcasting Co. has brazenly and publicly admitted, according to this news story, that in the exercising of this option it intended to turn the operation over to, or at least have the license of this radio station in the name of, persons in North Carolina who are, in this story, referred to as close political allies of the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission.

I question whether any person has any doubt but that such action will have, or should have, a tendency to influence the official acts of one entrusted with the regulation of communications, and surely the regulation of what in common knowledge is now a radio monopoly.

When the present Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission took office, with public knowledge that he was sent there to clean up the existing mess, he publicly stated that thereafter the affairs of the Commission would be conducted openly, comparable to well known glass bowl. The public's business would in reality be public. Yet it is my understanding that more secrecy surrounds their actions, except to the privileged few, than ever before; that more executive sessions have been held and less accomplished than ever before; that access to public records is virtually denied to everyone other than those who represent the radio monopolists.

One might well say that hypocrisy again prevails when one considers the Chairman's public utterances and compares such utterances with what is actually happening.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to say that a congressional investigation of the Federal Communications Commission and the radio monopoly will show that the Communications Act of 1934 is openly, flagrantly, and continually violated without any action or restraint on the part of the Federal Communications Commission. The law specifically requires the Commission to find that the licensee or grantee shall serve public interest, convenience, and necessity. Naturally those network officials residing in New York City, with no knowledge or interest in what constitutes public interest, convenience, and necessity in thousands of our communities throughout the United States, cannot know let alone serve as the Congress intended public interest, convenience, and necessity.

Mr. Speaker, many Members of the House seemingly overlook the interest which the American listening public has in the proper regulation of radio broadcasting. It is my understanding that official records reveal that Mr. John Q. Public has invested more than $2,000,000,000 in radio receiving sets while the total investment of radio broadcasters in 629 stations is less than $50,000,000.

With this investment of $50,000,000 plus possession of these invaluable grants from the Government, for which they pay nothing to the Government, their reported net profits last year, after paying all taxes, were some $18,000,000.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, with the radio monopoly about to unload upon an unsuspecting public television sets the value of which at this time, according to the newspapers, competent radio engineers question, is it not about time that the Congress, acting in the public interest, insisted upon a congressional investigation of the entire radio subject?

It will interest the Members of the House to know that in support of the charges I and others have laid before the House requesting a congressional investigation of this radio problem, a former general counsel of the Commission only recently placed before the Federal Communications Commission a request that an injunction be issued restraining the networks and their affiliated stations from a continuation of present contracts which are contrary to public interest.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely trust that the Rules Committee, having in mind the many existing serious and undenied charges pertaining to the flagrant violations of law in connection with the administration, regulation, and operation of radio, will see fit to report the resolution which I have introduced calling for a congressional investigation of the radio problem, thereby giving to the Members of this House the opportunity to vote on this important measure. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table and the legislative program and other special orders, he may address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by Albert J. Hutzler on the results of the reciprocal-trade agreements for 1938.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced in the House Concurrent Resolution No. 19, providing that the House does not favor the reorganization plan submitted by the President on yesterday.

The outstanding features of that proposal, to my mind, are these: There is a transfer to the Executive Office—that is, to the President's Office—of the Bureau of the Budget. This, to my mind, is proper. There is a transfer to the Executive Office of the Central Statistical Board, which is about to expire and will require renewal. It has been a complete failure in attempting to coordinate the statistical efforts of the Government. That is bad. There is also transferred to the Executive Office the National Resources Committee, which is about to expire and which has no legislative authority beyond a few months. The idea there begins of the Executive Office transferring activities that are about to expire and which have no permanence in with activities which are of a permanent character.

In the next set-up, the Federal Security Agency, in part II, certain regular activities of the Government, such as the United States Employment Service in the Department of Labor, the Office of Education in the Interior Department, the Public Health Service in the Treasury Department, and the Social Security Board, are the permanent activities which are transferred. Temporary activities, the N. Y. A. and the C. C. C., are transferred. One of these activities, the C. C. C., has about a year to run. The N. Y. A. has less than 2 months to run, and, without legislative action, will expire prior to the expiration of the 60 days which must elapse before such reorganization program can take effect.

The merging of relief activities with regular activities is absolutely ridiculous. It is demoralizing in every way. It will bring the level of the administration of permanent activities down to the level of those temporary relief activities which have been going on and which have been such a disgrace to the American Government for so long.

The third set-up is that of the Federal works agency, and here a new set-up is created having charge of regular activities consisting of the Bureau of Public Roads, the Public Buildings Branch of the Procurement Division, the Public Buildings Management Branch of the National Park Service; and with these are set up relief activities as follows: The W. P. A., the P. W. A., and the United States Housing Authority. W. P. A. will expire on the 30th of June. P. W. A. has already expired, except for carrying out things that were entered into prior to the 1st of January. The Housing Authority has already practically used up all of its authority to grant funds. The union of these activities in a works agency just means that our Bureau of Roads, our Procurement Division, and the Public Buildings Branch of the Park Service will be demoralized in efficiency of operation down to the level of the W. P. A., the P. W. A., and the Housing Authority. This is a serious thing, it is a demoralizing thing—it is something that absolutely should not be done.

Another feature is that the setting up of these things in what is a reorganization indicates an attempt at concentrated propaganda for the extension of those agencies so that something other than the merit of those agencies shall be used in the efforts that are made to extend them. I hope the membership of this House will give this thing careful study, and that when an opportunity to vote on it comes they will have in mind the destructive features of it, particularly so that they will not be led astray.

Someone has said that criticism of this kind of measure was not proper because that set-up in a reorganization plan could not under the reorganization bill extend the authority which these agencies already had. This, of course, is true; but it does not answer the criticism that the setting up of relief activities with permanent agencies of the Government is absolutely demoralizing and destructive to any kind of morale in any organization of the Government.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It seems to me that it is just as demoralizing for the Chief Executive to bring a function of the Government which expires, say, within 30 days into a permanent function of the Government; in other words, thus attempting to coerce or dominate the legislative branch is continuing that expiring function at the end of the 60 days.

Mr. TABER. That is demoralizing; there is no question about it; decidedly demoralizing.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let us assume that a given activity is operated by a board—take the R. F. C., for instance, or the Home Loan Bank Board. The situation developed in one of our committees. After the board or the agency that is merged is brought under the influence of an administrator in charge of the new set-up and the administrator overrules the decision of the board that is in charge of those functions of government, wherein is the general welfare assisted? Is not the board put in a position where it may speak, may set forth its position, but, as a matter of fact, it cannot act contrary to the administrator?

Mr. TABER. There are two matters in connection with the lending situation that are very bad. The Federal loan agency is set up, and under this are placed the R. F. C., the Electric Farm and Home Authority, and half a dozen other lending agencies. Then in what seems to me to be an absolutely ridiculous way the two items that the gentleman from Michigan has just referred to—only I shall name them—the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, are thrown under that agency.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. The Federal Home Loan Bank Board is made up of representatives of the savings and loan associations, and their expense is covered in the most part by the savings and loan institutions themselves, just as the Federal Reserve bank is supported by the national banks and the member banks.

That, to my mind, should not be interfered with by a Federal lending agency. It should be permitted to represent those institutions and look after those institutions as it has in the few years of its existence. I do not feel that the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation should be under such lending agency. It seems to me an absolutely ridiculous and incongruous set-up and should not be there.

Mr. Speaker, I have called attention to the ridiculous character of some of these set-ups. I wish to call attention to one other thing.

This is an attempt to coerce and force the Congress to continue those agencies which are about to expire. The cost of continuing them—and, as I stated, many of them are ridiculous and should not be continued—will run anywhere from two to four billion dollars a year, and that $4,000,000,000 extra spending is about all the economy that is involved in the reorganization proposal.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TABER. Yes; I yield to the Speaker.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman complains that the law authorizing the Civilian Conservation Corps will soon expire unless renewed.

Mr. TABER. It has a little over a year to run, as I remember. I have not the exact date of its expiration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would the gentleman from New York vote for a bill today or tomorrow to end the activities of the Civilian Conservation Corps?

Mr. TABER. I would. I have always voted against that activity and against its continuance.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman would abolish the National Youth Administration?

Mr. TABER. I would. It is a terribly demoralizing outfit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman recognize, despite his argument about the effort that is being made, that in the ultimate the Congress of the United States has the right either to continue or abolish these agencies, and is it not, in the last analysis, a legislative and not an executive function about which the gentleman complains?

Mr. TABER. It is a legislative function. What I am complaining about is that the Executive is setting up in a reorganization plan and grouping in a certain way activities that at the present time have no legislative authority for their continuance at the time that the reorganization plan may become effective.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman not be candid enough to admit that the functions of those agencies about which he complains being incorporated in this consolidation expire at a certain time, unless renewed by the Congress of the United States, and unless such renewal takes place, is it not a matter entirely beyond Executive discretion?

Mr. TABER. It is such a matter; but the fact they are grouped in advance of an extension of authorization by the Congress is going to be used as an argument to force the Congress to abdicate its legislative functions and its integrity in order to pass laws extending these activities.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Did I understand the gentleman to say he would vote to terminate the Electric Home and Farm Authority?

Mr. TABER. I did not mention the Electric Home and Farm Authority. I believe I would, though.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman would vote to terminate that agency?

Mr. TABER. I think I would.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. I take it the gentleman's complaint is that the President should not propose to the Congress efficiency and economy in any plan of reorganization by including in that plan emergency agencies which we were assured by the President when they were enacted were emergency agencies only and which the Congress has not as yet had opportunity to determine whether or not the conduct of the agencies warrant their continuance?

Mr. TABER. That is exactly one of my arguments.

Mr. MICHENER. The Speaker of the House indicated very clearly——

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Representative from the Seventh District of Alabama.

Mr. MICHENER. The Speaker of the House, exercising his right as the Representative from the Seventh District of Alabama, indicated very clearly to the House that it was the purpose of the administration to make permanent these temporary agencies which he designated. That being the case, then we have a right to expect and should proceed with consideration on the theory that the administration is going to ask that these unusual emergency agencies, operating under emergency power, shall be made permanent. Am I right?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. TABER. I think the gentleman is entitled to that privilege.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Michigan has a great sense of imagination, which I have seen him often display upon the floor of the House. He has added to that quality this afternoon by undertaking to construe in the remarks I made, and in my inquiry of the gentleman from New York, an assertion upon my part that I now favored making the C. C. C. a permanent institution. On the contrary, I do not favor making it a permanent institution until we are satisfied that by temporary extension its usefulness has expired. I do not resent the imagination of the gentleman from Michigan, but I do deplore his undertaking to read into my statement conclusions which were not justified by the words which I uttered.

Mr. MICHENER. I apologize to the gentleman from Alabama if I have misinterpreted his meaning, and I am glad that he agrees with the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Representative of the Seventh District of Alabama accepts the apology, and in no sense agrees with the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MICHENER. I am glad the gentleman from Alabama now understands what I said, and it would be unusual, indeed, if the gentleman from Alabama did agree with the gentleman from New York.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. In connection with the message that was sent here by the Chief Executive in connection with the proposal of reorganization, I do not believe it amiss to call attention at this time to one paragraph of the message. You will recall that the so-called reorganization bill passed a month or so ago prohibited interference with the Civil Service Commission in any reorganization plan. May I call attention to this paragraph:

> Because of an exemption in the act, it is impossible to transfer to the Executive Office the administration of the third managerial function of the Government—that of personnel. However, I desire to inform the Congress that it is my purpose to name one of the administrative assistants to the President, authorized in the Reorganization Act of 1939, to serve as liaison agent of the White House on personnel management.

I do not know what that means. I gather that it means there is to be an attempt to control the personnel system directly from the White House office, either through the personnel divisions in the different departments and agencies or through the Civil Service Commission. I do want to call attention to the fact that this seems to be absolutely contrary to what was the expressed will of the Congress when it excepted that Commission from the Reorganization Act.

[Here the gavel fell.]

SENATE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

Bills and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

S. 527. An act for the relief of J. J. Greenleaf; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 765. An act for the relief of Hugh McGuire; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 920. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the United States District Court for the District of Montana to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of the estate of Joseph Mihelich; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 927. An act to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Suncrest Orchards, Inc.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1092. An act for the relief of Sigvard C. Foro; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1160. An act for the relief of Roland Hanson, a minor, and Dr. E. A. Julien; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1372. An act for the relief of W. B. Tucker, Helen W. Tucker, Lonie Meadows, and Susie Meadows; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1448. An act for the relief of Anna H. Rosa; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1812. An act for the relief of A. E. Bostrom; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 2126. An act authorizing the Comptroller General of the United States to adjust and settle the claim of E. Devlin, Inc.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. J. Res. 11. Joint resolution directing the Comptroller General to readjust the account between the United States and the State of Vermont; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 2061. An act for the relief of Ernest O. Robinette and others;

H. R. 2074. An act for the relief of Junius Alexander;

H. R. 2098. An act for the relief of Katherine Patterson;

H. R. 2320. An act to provide domiciliary care, medical, and hospital treatment, and burial benefits to certain veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, and the Boxer Rebellion;

H. R. 3134. An act to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the temporary detail of United States employees, possessing special qualifications, to governments of American republics and the Philippines, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1938; and

H. R. 4630. An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 2061. An act for the relief of Ernest O. Robinette and others;

H. R. 2074. An act for the relief of Junius Alexander;

H. R. 2098. An act for the relief of Katherine Patterson;

H. R. 2320. An act to provide domiciliary care, medical, and hospital treatment, and burial benefits to certain veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, and the Boxer Rebellion;

H. R. 3134. An act to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the temporary detail of United States employees, possessing special qualifications, to governments of American republics and the Philippines, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1938; and

H. R. 4630. An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on last Monday I announced in this House the suicide of the Republican Party and suggested that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] was preparing a funeral oration which he would deliver probably sometime during the week. Having listened to that distinguished gentleman put on the finishing touch, I feel that the House should adjourn out of respect for the memory of that departed institution.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, April 27, 1939, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The Committee on Foreign Affairs will meet again Thursday, April 27, 1939, in the committee room, Capitol, for the purpose of continuing open hearings on the following bills and resolutions on the subject of neutrality: House Resolution 100, to prohibit the transfer, loan, or sale of arms or munitions (by Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts); House Joint Resolution 3, to prohibit the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from any place in the United States (by Mr. LUDLOW); House Joint Resolution 7, to implement the Kellogg-Briand Pact for World Peace (by Mr. GUYER of Kansas); House Joint Resolution 16, to prohibit the exportation of arms, ammunition, or implements or materials of war to any foreign country when the President finds a state of war to exist between or among two or more foreign states or between or among two or more opposing forces in the same foreign state (by Mr. KNUTSON); House Joint Resolution 42, providing for an embargo on scrap iron and pig iron under Public Resolution No. 27 of the Seventy-fifth Congress (by Mr. CRAWFORD); House Joint Resolution 44, to repeal the Neutrality Act (by Mr. FADDIS); House Joint Resolution 113, to prohibit the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from any place in the United States (by Mr. FISH); House Joint Resolution 226, to amend the Neutrality Act (by Mr. GEYER of California); House Joint Resolution 254, to keep the United States out of foreign wars, and to provide for the neutrality of the United States in the event of foreign wars (by Mr. FISH); House bill 79, to keep America out of war by repealing the so-called Neutrality Act of 1937 and by establishing and enforcing a policy of actual neutrality (by Mr. MAAS); House bill 163, to establish the neutrality of the United States (by Mr. LUDLOW); House bill 4232, to limit the traffic in war munitions, to promote peace, and for other purposes (by Mr. VOORHIS of California); House bill 5223, Peace Act of 1939 (by Mr. HENNINGS); House bill 5432, to prohibit the export of arms, ammunition, and implements and materials of war to Japan, to prohibit the transportation of arms, ammunition, implements, and materials of war by vessels of the United States for the use of Japan, to restrict travel by American citizens on Japanese ships, and otherwise to prevent private persons and corporations subject to the jurisdiction of the United States from rendering aid or support to the Japanese invasion of China (by Mr. COFFEE of Washington); House bill 5575, Peace Act of 1939 (by Mr. HENNINGS).

COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

There will be a meeting of the Petroleum Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at 2 p. m. Thursday, April 27, 1939. Business to be considered: Hearing on S. 1302, petroleum shipments.

COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries will hold public hearings in room 219, House Office Building, at 10 a. m., on the bills and dates listed below:

On Thursday, April 27, 1939, on H. R. 4983, to amend sections 712 and 902 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, relative to the requisitioning of vessels.

On Thursday, May 4, 1939, at 10 a. m., on H. R. 4650, making electricians licensed officers.

COMMITTEE ON ROADS

(Tuesday, May 2, 1939)

The Committee on Roads will hold public hearings on Tuesday, May 2, 1939, at 10 a. m., in the Roads Committee room, 1011 New House Office Building (ground floor), on the following acts and bills:

S. 1109 and H. R. 3522, to amend the act entitled "An act to aid the several States in making, or for having made, certain toll bridges on the system of Federal-aid highways free bridges, and for other purposes," by providing that funds available under such act may be used to match regular and secondary Federal-aid road funds.

S. 1985, to extend the time within which the States may cause toll bridges to be made free in order to qualify for aid under the act of August 14, 1937.

H. R. 4541, to provide for the completion of a part of the Lewis and Clark Highway between Kooskia, Idaho, and a point near Lolo, Mont.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS

There will be a meeting of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads at 10 a. m. Tuesday, May 2, 1939, for the consideration of H. J. Res. 228, to declare certain papers and writings nonmailable.

COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

There will be a meeting of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization at 10:30 a. m. Wednesday, May 3, and Thursday, May 4, 1939, on bills H. R. 3657, H. R. 5401, H. R. 5402, and H. R. 5403. These hearings will be public.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

675. Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation and a proposed change in the text of the same appropriation for the Navy Department; this estimate involves an increase aggregating $31,621,000 in the estimates of appropriations for the Navy Department now contained in said Budget (H. Doc. No. 267), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII,

Mr. BLAND: Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. H. R. 5129. A bill authorizing and providing for the construction of additional facilities on the Canal Zone for the purposes of more adequately providing for the defense of the Panama Canal and for increasing its capacity for the future needs of interoceanic shipping; without amendment (Rept. No. 494). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CELLER: Committee on the Judiciary. H. R. 2567. A bill to provide that records certified by the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court, in response to writs of certiorari, may include material portions of the evidence, and for other purposes; without amendment (Rept. SENATE

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, 1939

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Deepen and quicken in us, O God, the sense of Thy presence and companionship, that in the strength of it we may walk as children of light. Open wide the windows of our spirits and the doors of our hearts that we may receive and welcome Thee as the Guest and Master of our lives.

Take our lips and speak through them; kindle our minds with thoughts of Thee; set our wills on fire to do Thy will and to serve Thy children; open our eyes and show us here an invisible world far better than we have dreamed of.

Help us always to believe in the best that we know and the best that our hearts have hoped for, that so we may be delivered from all haste and dismay, with our daily lives set before us in the quiet light of eternity until, led by Thy spirit, we pass into the land of promise. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, April 25, 1939, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE DURING ADJOURNMENT

Under authority of the order of the 25th instant,

On April 26, 1939, the following message was received by the Secretary of the Senate from the House of Representatives: That the House agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3134) to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the temporary detail of United States employees, possessing special qualifications, to governments of American republics and the Philippines, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1938; and that the House had passed the bill (S. 572) to provide for the common defense by acquiring stocks of strategic and critical materials essential to the needs of industry for the manufacture of supplies for the armed forces and the civilian population in time of a national emergency, and to encourage, as far as possible, the further development of strategic and critical materials within the United States for common defense, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also communicated the intelligence that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 2061. An act for the relief of Ernest O. Robinette and others;

H. R. 2074. An act for the relief of Junius Alexander;

H. R. 2098. An act for the relief of Katherine Patterson;

H. R. 2320. An act to provide domiciliary care, medical and hospital treatment, and burial benefits to certain veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, and the Boxer Rebellion;

H. R. 3134. An act to amend the act entitled "An act authorizing the temporary detail of United States employees, possessing special qualifications, to governments of American republics and the Philippines, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1938; and

H. R. 4630. An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5287) relating to the importation of distilled spirits for consumption at the New York World's Fair, 1939, and the Golden Gate International Exposition of 1939, and to duties on certain articles to be exhibited at the New York World's Fair, 1939.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 4929. An act to amend the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 944); and

H. R. 5765. An act to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves upon completion of training, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 5287) relating to the importation of distilled spirits for consumption at the New York World's Fair, 1939, and the Golden Gate International Exposition for 1939, and to duties on certain articles to be exhibited at the New York World's Fair, 1939, and it was signed by the Vice President.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE (S. DOC. NO. 69)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a supplemental estimate of appropriation, fiscal year 1940, for the Department of Agriculture, in the sum of $300,000, for extension work, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Administrator of the Federal Housing Administration, transmitting, pursuant to law (in three parts), the fifth annual report of the operations of the Administration for the calendar year 1938, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

REPORT OF THE ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL (S. DOC. NO. 68)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Architect of the Capitol, transmitting, pursuant to law, his annual report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1938, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Joint Resolution 26

The Legislature of the State of Minnesota in regular session assembled memorializes the Congress of the United States to grant relief from the existing treaties and laws regulating and controlling the production of sugar by the farmers of Minnesota, and calling attention to the prejudicial effects of such treaties and laws

Whereas by treaty the sugar producers of Cuba have been granted 50 percent of the sugar market of the United States, the insular possessions of the United States 26 percent, and the farmers of the United States but 24 percent of said domestic sugar market; and

Whereas in the State of Minnesota there are certain sections, notably the Red River Valley and the Chaska district and other districts in the State of Minnesota, where soil conditions will permit the production of sugar beets on thousands of acres of land in this State and will permit needed diversification in our agriculture, and thousands of our farmers could find a profitable source of income, in addition to the furnishing of employment to a large number of our citizens who cannot now find employment; and

Whereas the said treaty with Cuba deprives the Minnesota farmer of an opportunity to make a living and enjoy the benefits of the markets of his own country; and

Whereas the Sugar Act of 1937 imposes burdens, restrictions, and requirements by its terms and as interpreted by the Agricultural Department of the United States, which constitute a hindrance and further disadvantage to the Minnesota farmer; and

Whereas we, as citizens of Minnesota, taxpayers of Minnesota, and citizens of the United States, feel that it should be the first purpose of the Congress of the United States to look after the people of our own country and not of any foreign country, and feel that the Congress of the United States should further examine said treaty and further examine the Sugar Act of 1937 and its prejudicial effect upon the beet-sugar producers of this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota in regular session assembled, That we memorialize the Congress of the United States to grant relief from the said treaty referred to and the said act of Congress referred to, to the end that the farmers of the United States may be permitted to enlarge their production of sugar so that the farmers of the United States may enjoy to the fullest possible extent the market of the United States, and that the restrictive features of the said act of Congress referred to be repealed; be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to send certified copies of this resolution to Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; to the Honorable John Garner, President of the Senate of the United States; and the Honorable William B. Bankhead, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States; and two copies to the Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace; and to Minnesota's Representatives in the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of Minnesota, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Joint Resolution 23

The Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in regular session assembled, memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact the Frazier-Lemke plan for Federal refinancing of farm mortgages

Whereas there has been introduced in the Congress of the United States at its present session the Frazier-Lemke plan for Federal refinancing of farm mortgages, which provides that farmers obtaining Federal loans can repay them over a period of 47 years, the loan to be repaid at the rate of 1½ percent per year, and bear interest at the rate of 1½ percent on the unpaid principal; and

Whereas existing loans would be refinanced on the basis of the present mortgage indebtedness, but in no case to exceed a fair valuation of the property, the program to be financed by the issuance of Federal Reserve notes; and

Whereas the Frazier-Lemke plan is the best and most just legislation that has been proposed to help the farm mortgage situation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota in regular session assembled, That we memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact at its present session the Frazier-Lemke plan for Federal refinancing of farm mortgages; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Minnesota transmit copies of this resolution to the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States.

Joint Resolution 25

Relating to deficiency judgments against borrowers from Federal land banks

Whereas since 1934 the Federal lending agencies engaged in lending money to farmers, the Federal land banks, and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation have foreclosed not less than 60,000 farm mortgages; and

Whereas these Federal lending agencies hold less than 40 percent of the total farm-mortgage debt of the country; and

Whereas in most of these foreclosures the farmer is not only dispossessed of his property but the mortgagee frequently obtains a judgment against the farmer, which permanently pauperizes him; and

Whereas this situation has created an emergency which calls for the special consideration of Congress and the immediate enactment of such legislation as will protect the farmer in his right to his home and bring an end to a system that makes a pauper of him: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota in regular session assembled (the senate concurring), That we hereby memorialize Congress to enact Senate Joint Resolution No. 65, relating to deficiency judgments against borrowers from Federal land banks.

Joint Resolution 27

The Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in regular session assembled, memorialize Congress and the President of the United States to restore to Congress the right to fix and regulate the value of money under the Constitution

Whereas, with a national debt of the Federal Government and its political subdivisions of $70,000,000,000, carrying with it an annual interest burden of nearly $2,000,000,000, the Nation is so hopelessly sunk in its economic mire that a sound recovery is an utter impossibility without a drastic change in the Nation's monetary system and the fiscal policies pursued by our Government;

Whereas the Governor of the State of Minnesota and the Republican Party is pledged in its platform to restore this privilege to Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota in regular session assembled, That we urge upon Congress to pass such legislation and the President of the United States to support the same, providing that Congress exercise its duty and right under the Constitution to coin, issue, fix, and regulate money and that fiscal policies be adopted by which the Government shall finance all useful permanent public improvements by the issue of legal-tender currency instead of interest-bearing, tax-exempt bonds. And, furthermore, that the Government shall issue and lend, without interest, legal-tender currency to any of its political subdivisions for the purpose of financing necessary public improvements.

All currency so issued to be repaid and/or taxed back into the United States Treasury at a rate sufficiently large to prevent any abnormal inflation of the currency. Be it further Resolved, That the secretary of state of Minnesota is hereby instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Representative and Senator from the State of Minnesota, and to the President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution of the General Court of Massachusetts, favoring the enactment of legislation to increase the amounts of old-age assistance payable by the Government to States and their political subdivisions, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

(See resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. WALSH on the 25th instant, p. 4714, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the petition of Chester A. Shewalter, of Sparta, Wis., praying for the adoption of a pay-as-you-go financial program based upon the so-called Townsend plan, with amendments, for issuance of $130,000,000 in a stamp proposal on a $100 basis, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate petitions of sundry citizens of the United States, praying for the enactment of the so-called Wagner-Van Nuys-Capper antilynching bill, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Rotary Club of San Juan, P. R., protesting against the enactment of the so-called Ellender bill, being Senate bill 69, relating to sugar quotas, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN presented a petition of 450 citizens of the State of Oregon praying for the placing of a restriction on credits and an embargo on the shipment of war materials to Japan, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by Gold Camp, No. 5930, Royal Neighbors of America, of Overbrook, Kans., protesting against the imposition of taxes upon fraternal societies, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition, numerously signed, of members of the Townsend Club of Buffalo, Kans., praying for the enactment of House bill 2, a general-welfare bill providing old-age assistance, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TYDINGS presented a resolution of the Building and Construction Trades Council of Western Maryland, in session at Cumberland, Md., favoring the cessation of encroachment on building and construction work in Cumberland, Md., and vicinity by the Works Progress Administration, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution of the Maryland Chapter, International Federation of Catholic Alumnae, favoring the return of the U. S. frigate Constellation to the port of Baltimore, Md., and the assignment of the frigate to a permanent berth at Fort McHenry, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. VANDENBERG presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, praying for the enactment of legislation providing an average cost of production, plus a fair profit, for all products grown by the American farmer and consumed within the United States, and also praying for the enactment of the so-called Frazier-Lemke farm refinancing bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of the State of Michigan, praying for the enactment of neutrality legislation that will keep the United States clear of foreign entanglements and also keep the Nation out of foreign war, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. HOLT presented a communication of Prosperity Camp, No. 2773, Royal Neighbors of America, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a recent meeting of Prosperity Camp, No. 2773, Royal Neighbors of America, a resolution was adopted to ask support in bringing about an amendment to the Federal Social Security Act in order that the camp would not be considered an employer and its paid officers considered as employees under this act.

It was stated that the offices held are nearly always honorary positions with the exception of a few and in these instances the compensation is so small that maintaining the record would probably cost more than the amount of tax paid to the Government.

(This resolution was signed by eight officers of the organization.)

THE ALASKA RAILROAD

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, last year officials of Alaska asked for an investigation of the Alaska Railroad. Quite a long list of recommendations of needs was submitted. I am going to present the papers again and ask that they be referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. If any member of the committee desires to have such an investigation, at the next meeting of the committee we will be glad to go into it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the papers presented by the Senator from Maryland will be received and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

ADMISSION OF GERMAN REFUGEE CHILDREN

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD and appropriately referred a telegram from George Meany, president of the New York State Federation of Labor, in support of the bill to admit German refugee children, and editorials on the same subject from the following-named newspapers: New Orleans (La.) Times-Picayune, March 16, 1939; San Antonio (Tex.) Express, April 18, 1939; Jacksonville (Fla.) Journal, April 19, 1939; Cincinnati (Ohio) Enquirer, April 21, 1939; Philadelphia (Pa.) Evening Ledger, April 22, 1939; Philadelphia (Pa.) Record, April 25, 1939; and the New York Herald Tribune, April 25, 1939.

There being no objection, the telegram and editorials were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALBANY, N. Y., April 25, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building:

New York State Federation of Labor heartily endorses your humane bill to admit 20,000 German refugee children to this country during the next 2 years.

GEORGE MEANY, President.
JOHN M. O'HANLON, Secretary-Treasurer.

[From the New Orleans Times-Picayune of March 16, 1939]

ASYLUM FOR CHILD REFUGEES

For obvious and compelling reasons few Americans favor any general let-down of our immigration restrictions. For one thing, millions of our present population lack employment and it would be folly to increase our unemployed army by any wholesale admission of aliens. For another, there is taught in some overseas lands the dangerous doctrine that emigrants therefrom and their descendants must always owe allegiance to the land they left regardless of their obligations to the land in which they make their home. This curious cult makes potential traitors of aliens who migrate to the United States under its spell. It is making trouble for us even now.

Most Americans deeply sympathize, nevertheless, with the desperate plight of brutally oppressed minorities in sundry European countries. Among these unfortunates are thousands of little children. England has admitted some thousands of them. Belgium, France, Holland, and Sweden have granted refuge to other thousands. Kindly Americans have organized a nonsectarian committee for German refugee children, headed by Cardinal Mundelein, of Chicago, to rescue and care for some of these childish victims of despotism. This group, working in collaboration with the American Friends Service Commission, has guaranties of adequate financial backing to insure that refugee children admitted to this country will not become public charges and will be given comfortable homes and American education.

Congress now has before it the Wagner-Rogers bill, permitting admission to the United States during 1939 of 10,000 German children under the age of 14 years and of a similar number during 1940—or so many thereof as can be guaranteed adequate support in this country. Both factions of organized labor have endorsed the measure. Hundreds of prominent Americans of all religious creeds and political persuasions are giving it support.

Here is something the American people can do safely for the victims of cruelty and oppression overseas. The rescue of thousands of these little ones, some of them from Catholic, some of them from Jewish, and some of them from Protestant families, awaits the grant of permission by Congress. Their need of rescue is so urgent that Congress should pass the enabling bill promptly.

[From the San Antonio Express of April 18, 1939]

A HAVEN FOR CHILDREN WHO ARE CRUELLY SCOURGED

Perhaps the most tragic and appealing aspect of Nazi persecution in Central Europe is the plight of many thousand refugee children. Those innocent victims of savagery would be unable to fend for themselves even in a friendly country. As it is, any who shall survive the privation and cruelty to which they have been subjected will be exposed to antisocial influences there. They will grow up to be criminals, or else their minds—plastic at this stage of life—will be infused with doctrines that repress liberty and glorify violence and aggression.

Those children are utterly helpless, as a rule. A soulless state has robbed their parents of homes, savings, and means of support. Many fathers and mothers have been forced to flee their homeland or have been thrown into prisons or concentration camps. Others have been killed or have died from the ordeal of persecution. The adult refugees fortunate enough to keep their families together can offer the children no hope. They are anxious to find homes for them in lands where they will have opportunity to grow into self-respecting free men and women.

Like other humanitarians, Americans cannot complacently ignore the inarticulate appeal of these refugee children who grope for succor in a man-made darkness. Many already have been taken in by overcrowded Holland, by France, Great Britain, and other nations where compassion is not a lost emotion.

The United States should do its share. The way is pointed by the Non-Sectarian Committee for German Refugee Children that, in collaboration with the American Friends Service Commission, has guaranteed sufficient financial support to insure against refugee children admitted here becoming public charges. Such civic leaders as Cardinal Mundelein, of Chicago; Mrs. Calvin Coolidge, of Northampton, Mass.; Governor Lehman, of New York; the Reverend Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, and many others, are aiding the movement, which is nonsectarian and nonpolitical. It is endorsed by the two greatest labor organizations in the country and by Protestants, Catholics, and Jews alike.

Because of the immigration laws, however, Congress must act before the refugee children may come to this country. To that end Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, New York, and Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, Massachusetts, are sponsoring legislation to permit 10,000 German-born refugee children, under 14 years old, to be brought into the United States during 1939, outside the quota limits; and a like number next year. Their admission is contingent upon assurance that homes can be found for them and that they will not become public charges.

That bill should be passed without delay so that suffering boys and girls can be given a helping hand as soon as possible. About half the children whom American humanitarians are endeavoring to aid are Jewish, the others are Protestants and Catholics who also have been touched by Nazi cruelty.

All should make good citizens. As the New York Times points out, their background is in their favor; they are alone in the world because their parents put obedience to conscience above obedience to tyranny. They would appreciate liberty and decent laws because they are not too young to understand what oppression means.

The people have made it clear that they desire to help refugee children. Let Congress consider American public sentiment—and perhaps the poet Masefield's words:

"Lord, give to men who are old and rougher
The things that little children suffer,
And let keep bright and undefiled
The young years of the little child."

[From the Jacksonville Journal of April 19, 1939]

AMERICA, THE REFUGE

Under no circumstances should enthusiasm for the Wagner-Rogers resolution in Congress be allowed to wane, and Jaxons can contribute, and should contribute their share by writing our Congressmen and Senators.

This measure provides for admission of 20,000 refugee children from Germany, children of every religion. The American Federation of Labor, Congress of Industrial Organizations, Herbert Hoover, Alfred Landon, and Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt are among outstanding endorsers, and Jacksonville should not permit time to pass without expressing its endorsement of this humanitarian measure.

Reasons cited by Senator WAGNER at the time of his introduction of the bill, are most expressive and are sentiments that no doubt most everyone shares here, but which few so far have indicated. Senator WAGNER said:

"Millions of innocent and defenseless men, women, and children in Germany today, of every race and creed, are suffering from conditions which compel them to seek refuge in other lands. Our hearts go out especially to the children of tender years, who are the most pitiful and helpless sufferers. The admission of a limited number of these children into the United States would release them from the prospect of life without hope and without recourse, and enable them to grow up in an environment where the human spirit may survive and prosper.

"This resolution does not suspend existing quota restrictions on the immigration of adults. It merely authorizes the admission during a limited period of a limited number of refugee children, 14 years of age or under. This could readily be accomplished without their becoming public charges and without any danger of dislocating American industry or displacing American labor. Their admission would be predicated on satisfactory and voluntary undertakings by responsible American citizens or private organizations that adequate provision would be made for their maintenance and care, in homes of their own faiths.

"Thousands of American families have already expressed their willingness to take refugee children into their homes. Recently 49 of the outstanding Catholic and Protestant prelates of the United States, including His Eminence Cardinal Mundelein, joined in a statement urging our people 'to join together without regard to race, religion, or creed in offering refuge to children as a token of our sympathy and as a symbol of our faith in the ideals of human brotherhood.' Both branches of the labor movement have now joined in expressing sympathy for this objective.

"Such action by the United States would follow the precedent of England and Holland, which have given sanctuary to many of these unfortunate victims of persecution. It would constitute our most immediate and practical contribution to the cause of human freedom, to which we are inseverably bound by our institutions, our history, and our profoundest sentiments. I have every confidence that there will be prompt and wholehearted response throughout the country to this humanitarian plan, whereby the American people will give expression to their innermost cravings for liberty, justice, and international peace."

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer of April 21, 1939]

CHILDREN IN DISTRESS

It seems a little strange that it should be necessary to goad Congress into allowing the entry of some thousands of refugee children into the United States to save them from the frustration and humiliation of being outcasts. It would seem that American public opinion was clear enough, in respect to the crimes worked against children in Nazi Germany, to justify Congress in immediate action.

Yet there are sanctimonious voices being raised to bar the way against the rescue of a few thousand of these children. To receive them, we hear, would be to open the floodgates and invite millions of aliens to our shores. That is a fantastic distortion of the facts. This surely is not the voice of the America we all know and love. This surely is not the shabby result of a century and a half of freedom, of devotion to humanitarian ideals.

Senator ROBERT WAGNER and Representative EDITH ROGERS have introduced bills to admit 10,000 refugee children a year for 2 years—20,000 of the 100,000 children of various religious faiths who are denied any chance to grow up in a climate of tolerance.

These children would be under 14, would not be in economic competition with American workers, and would not become a charge on the public purse, and would be eligible for entry under the existing immigration laws.

Homes in this country are waiting for them. Charitable organizations of three great religious faiths are prepared to finance the transportation of the refugee children and place them, all without cost to the Government.

America for centuries has been the refuge of persecuted peoples. Its freedom has been great enough to encompass multitudes denied the right to live peacefully in despotic lands abroad. Unless the spirit of a free and generous American people has atrophied beyond recognition, Congress will be made to understand that there is room in this Nation of 130,000,000 for a few thousand more. Our condemnation of nazi-ism will be a mockery if we cannot open our doors for this small share of the innocent children made victims of a brutal persecution.

[From the Philadelphia Evening Ledger of April 22, 1939]

A PLEA FOR CHILDREN

Much more effective than most arguments for relaxing the immigration laws was the pleading of Helen Hayes before the Joint Congressional Committee on Immigration. Miss Hayes, whose name in private life is Mrs. Charles MacArthur, asked that this Nation assume a share of a world-wide responsibility to care for the orphaned and exiled children of Europe.

A resolution is before the committee which would permit 20,000 German refugee children, not over 14 years of age, to enter the United States regardless of quota restrictions. Half of them would come here next year, the other half in 1941.

Mrs. MacArthur spoke to the committee as a mother and as a mother who has herself adopted a child. She was pleading, in effect, that Uncle Sam should adopt some of the waifs and strays of Europe, pitiful little creatures who have no home and no place to go. Their plight is tragic, and civilization cannot ignore it. Other nations have offered a haven of refuge for them. They have found, too, that to care for these homeless children is no easy task.

But the alternative of leaving them to their fate is impossible in a presumably civilized world. There are objections to admitting any of them to the United States, but their desperate need and the claims of common humanity may outweigh them. These were the basis of Helen Hayes' plea for charity to children, innocent victims of war and racial hatreds in Europe.

[From the New York Herald Tribune of April 25, 1939]

THIS MUCH WE CAN DO

Probably few bills could be brought into Congress which would enlist the combined support of Mr. Herbert Hoover and Senator WAGNER, of A. F of L. and C. I. O. leaders, of Miss Helen Hayes, of Miss Dorothy Thompson, of religious leaders representing all the great faiths, of countless others representing every different kind of social and economic interest and political attitude. Yet, the Wagner bill to admit 20,000 German refugee children outside the quota restrictions has done so. We do not know whether our voice can add anything to those of the distinguished men and women who have given their earnest and active support to this measure; we doubt that any argument can speak more strongly than the natural promptings of the great mass of Americans in favor of this one humane gesture against all the enormous misery with which the new bigotry has filled the world. But it is a cause about which none would wish to remain silent, whether it needs support or not.

The opposition, such as it is, has scarcely opposed the bill itself; it has been obliged to fall back upon the old argument that if this measure is passed there will be "no logical reason" why further relaxation should not be made in the immigration laws until the whole structure is reduced to ruins. There are plenty of logical reasons, as a matter of fact, to prevent any such result, and it is idle to deal in such fantasy. But this is not a measure in which a cold logic either should or can rule. It is a gesture and, logically, it is an inadequate one at best. It is not throwing open the arms of the United States to succor all the distressed in the world, but it is for once a departure from the harsh and heartless rigidity of legalistic regulation with which the world is stifled in order to render some small aid to a small group of helpless children, victimized by a cruel age. This much, certainly, the United States can do.

[From the Philadelphia Record of April 25, 1939]

TWENTY THOUSAND HOMELESS CHILDREN AT THE DOOR

It is difficult to view the European situation today without wanting to do something about it. For many this natural desire seems to take the form of wanting to go to war to end fascism. But many others—the majority, we feel—believe that such a course would come dangerously close to compounding the evil.

Both those who believe that we should intervene in Europe and those who are against intervention can join in support of the Wagner-Rogers bill which will permit 20,000 refugee children from Germany to enter this country.

Here is an opportunity to express, in a practical way that harms no one, the humanitarian instincts called forth by Nazi persecution.

The Wagner-Rogers bill is neither a partisan nor a sectarian measure. Its chief sponsor is the Friends' Service Committee, which will have charge of selecting the children to enter and which will find the homes in which to place them. Already 5,000 offers to adopt the refugees have been received.

The supporters of the bill range from Herbert Hoover and Dorothy Thompson to the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

The refugees themselves are of all faiths and their families have fled from Germany for a variety of reasons. Catholics and Protestants have been persecuted in Germany as well as Jews. Many families have been forced to leave their fatherland for professing the political principles on which the United States rests.

That is why our Government took the lead in sponsoring the Evian conference for the evacuation of refugees. No country can absorb them all—but we can do our share.

Holland, Britain, the Scandinavian countries—all far more crowded than the United States—are cooperating in the plan. Twenty thousand children will make no appreciable difference in our population, nor will they create any special problem here.

The bill limits eligibility to children below 14 years old. That means they will receive an American education and will be influenced in their formative years by American home training.

If they bear with them throughout their lives a memory of what oppression has meant to their parents and themselves—so much the better for their value as future citizens of this democracy.

Waves of reaction have swept Europe before during the last 300 years. After every one of them the United States has been enriched by a wave of refugees—who have contributed more than their share to the building up of this country.

The Wagner-Rogers bill is one measure upon which conservative, liberal, and radical; isolationist and interventionist; rich and poor can unite.

Mr. REYNOLDS presented three letters published in the Washington Post of April 26, together with an article, referring to the proposed admission of refugee children into the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

PROPOSED COTTON EXPORT SUBSIDY—REQUEST FOR HEARING

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I present a telegram which I have just received from the Cotton Manufacturers' Association of Georgia, asking for a public hearing before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations in charge of the Agricultural appropriation bill on the proposed export subsidy so far as it relates to cotton. I ask that the telegram be inserted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ATLANTA, GA.

Hon. WALTER F. GEORGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Numerous telephone calls and telegrams which I am receiving from textile millmen throughout Georgia indicate widespread apprehension over cotton export subsidy proposal. It is inconceivable that the Senate will proceed with consideration of this legislation without receiving the views of those whose business will be so seriously affected by this unsound plan. It will really amount to a subsidy for foreign cotton manufacturers who have already taken away our export markets and who are now flooding this country with cotton goods produced by labor whose wages are far below the statutory standards required of American mills. The cotton mills are the farmer's best customers and they employ more than 60,000 workers in Georgia alone. Therefore, I respectfully urge that you insist upon a public hearing in order that our industry may point out the dangers inherent in this proposal.

T. M. FORBES, Secretary.

(Mr. WILEY also introduced Senate Joint Resolution 121, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. DONAHEY:

S. J. Res. 122. Joint resolution to provide for the observance and celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of the city of Gallipolis, Ohio; to the Committee on the Library.

(Mr. PITTMAN introduced Senate Joint Resolution 123, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and appears under a separate heading.)

BARTER OF SURPLUS AMERICAN BUTTER AND CHEESE

Mr. WILEY. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 121) authorizing the President to enter into a barter agreement with the Government of Great Britain for the exchange of surplus United States butter and cheese for certain materials essential for national defense, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Whereas the marketing of butter and cheese in the United States has been disrupted as a result of the existence of surplus quantities of butter and cheese; and

Whereas the Federal Government has, through the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, been conducting a program designed to remove surplus quantities of agricultural commodities from market; and

Whereas such program to be most effective should be so conducted that the surplus quantities thus removed will not be so used as to affect the normal market for such commodities for domestic consumption; and

Whereas shipment of such surplus quantities to foreign countries would prevent them from affecting the normal markets for such commodities for domestic consumption; and

Whereas it appears that there is a deficiency in the quantities of butter and cheese available for market in Great Britain; and

Whereas Great Britain has a surplus of certain materials essential to national defense and of which American supplies are inadequate; and

Whereas it is probable that Great Britain would be willing to enter into an agreement with the United States for the barter of such materials for surplus American butter and cheese: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and requested to carry on negotiations with the Government of Great Britain, in such manner as he may deem appropriate, for the purpose of determining whether or not the Government of Great Britain is willing to enter into a barter agreement with the Government of the United States for the exchange of quantities of surplus United States butter and cheese for quantities of strategic materials which Great Britain may have available for barter. If the President finds that he is able to enter into a satisfactory barter agreement with the Government of Great Britain, he is authorized to enter into such an agreement providing for the exchange of such quantities of butter and cheese as the United States may be able to purchase with any sum not in excess of $10,000,000.

SEC. 2. Upon the consummation of any agreement under the provisions of the first section of this act, the President shall notify the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation with respect to the quantities and specifications of the butter and cheese which will be required for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of such agreement, and the Corporation shall then proceed to purchase such butter and cheese in such manner as to remove surplus butter and cheese from the United States markets but not to increase unreasonably the price of butter and cheese consumed by domestic consumers. The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation shall arrange for the packing of such butter and cheese and for its transportation and delivery to such place of shipment as the President may designate.

SEC. 3. The President is authorized to enter into contracts, through such executive departments or agencies of the United States as he may deem appropriate, for any transoceanic shipment of such butter and cheese which may be necessary under the terms of such agreement.

SEC. 4. The strategic materials acquired by the United States under the terms of such agreement shall be allocated by the President to such of the executive departments and agencies of the United States as he may designate. The executive departments and agencies to which such materials are allocated shall take possession of them at such time and place as the President may designate and shall store them and maintain them in storage as reserve stocks to be used only in the event the President declares that a national emergency justifying the use of such reserve stocks exists.

SEC. 5. As used in this joint resolution, the term "strategic materials" means articles, commodities, materials, or supplies which are essential for the national defense and which are not produced in the United States or are not produced in the United States in sufficient quantities to meet the needs of the United States for such articles, commodities, materials, or supplies for national defense purposes.

SEC. 6. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated (1) such sums not in excess of $10,000,000 as may be necessary to enable the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation to purchase any butter and cheese which it may be required to purchase under the provisions of this joint resolution, and (2) such additional sums as may be necessary to enable the President to carry out the provisions of this joint resolution. Such additional sums may be allocated by the President to any of the executive departments or agencies of the United States, and may be expended without regard to any other provisions of law relating to the expenditure of public funds.

TREATY VIOLATION

Mr. PITTMAN. I introduce a joint resolution for appropriate reference. As it deals with a subject in which the Senate has a great deal of interest I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) relative to violation of a treaty, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized to place restrictions upon trade and commerce between the United States and any state, a party to the treaty (nine-power pact) between the United States, Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, The Netherlands, and Portugal, regarding principles and policies to be followed in matters concerning China, signed at Washington, February 6, 1922, when he shall adjudge and decree that such state is endangering the lives of our citizens or depriving them of their legal rights and privileges through the commission of acts or through failure to perform acts in violation of the express provisions and guarantees in said treaty: Provided, That this act shall not authorize any restrictions upon exports of agricultural products of the United States or possessions over which it has sovereignty, and: Provided further, That in the enforcement of the provisions of this act there shall be no discrimination between states, parties to said treaty, who are equally violators thereof.

SEC. 2. Such restrictions may be imposed by the President from time to time through embargoes upon the export and import of certain commodities, articles, and materials, and by restrictions upon monetary exchange and credits specifically limited and defined in proclamations made by the President.

It is the intent of Congress that the authority herein granted shall be exercised to the extent only as may be considered necessary in the protection of the lives of our citizens and their rights and privileges guaranteed under said treaty, and not until after the President has made every reasonable effort to induce said State to comply with the terms of said treaty as affecting the lives of our citizens and their rights and privileges.

SEC. 3. That the President shall not have authority to impose any of the restrictions provided for in this act or to issue any proclamations relative thereto, except as provided in section 5, until 10 days after he shall have submitted to both branches of Congress while in session the proclamation he intends to make relative to such restrictions, accompanied by a full report of the facts, evidence, and diplomatic correspondence bearing upon the necessity for his intended action.

SEC. 4. The President shall carry out the provisions of this act through proclamations which shall have the force of law and through appropriate and consistent rules and regulations that he may from time to time promulgate.

SEC. 5. When a proclamation has been made under the provisions of this act and thereafter the President finds that said violations of said treaty have ceased, or when the President determines further enforcement of the provisions of the act are unnecessary to secure the safety of the lives of our citizens and the protection of their said rights and privileges, then he shall so proclaim, and thereupon and thereafter all former proclamations shall be deemed repealed, and all acts and things done under such proclamations shall also be deemed to be repealed and shall be of no further force and effect. The President may from time to time, by proclamation annul or modify any restrictions theretofore imposed.

SEC. 6. This act shall terminate on the 1st day of May 1940, and all proclamations issued thereunder and all acts and things done by virtue of said proclamations shall upon said date be deemed repealed and cease to have force and effect.

TAX ON EMPLOYERS—AMENDMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in introducing a bill for the amendment of the social security law I should like to speak very briefly on an obvious misapplication of the social security law as it is applied to organizations such as chambers of commerce and trade organizations.

The intention of the Social Security Act regarding employers subject to the pay-roll tax under title IX seems quite apparent. In 1935, when the Social Security Act became law, it provided for two sets of pay-roll taxes. There was the tax on employers and employees for the Federal plan of insurance for old age, and there was the 3-percent tax on pay rolls of employers of eight or more persons.

Title XI of the act, which defines the meaning of words used in the act was clarified by the insertion of the following definition of an employee:

> The term "employee" includes an officer of a corporation (sec. 1101 (a) (6)).

It is obvious that these pay-roll taxes were to extend to the salaries of officers of a corporation, whatever their function and however large their compensation. All of this meant that the pay-roll tax in connection with old-age insurance was to be paid upon the first $3,000 of the salary paid to any officer of a corporation subject to the provisions as to old-age insurance. The 3-percent tax was to be paid upon the entire salary of any officer of a corporation which would be required to pay a tax because it had eight or more employees.

The Bureau of Internal Revenue on May 24, 1937, without a hearing, published a ruling that honorary officers of a corporation who received no compensation were, under the definition of the act, to be considered as "employees." That, of course, meant that they were to be counted with the paid employees to make up the eight or more "employees" necessary to place a corporation within the provisions of the 3-percent tax.

Since that time every small chamber of commerce and every small trade association with fewer paid employees than eight has been heckled with demands for payment of the 3-percent tax—not only for the current year, but also for 1936 and each following year. The law set the tax at 1 percent in 1936, 2 percent in 1937, and 3 percent since then. All the demands for this tax have been based on the ruling in 1937 which concerned honorary officers.

This was the beginning of the assumption that if uncompensated honorary officers are to be counted as "employees," then there should be counted as "employees" any active officers who receive no compensation.

After several years there was finally a reconsideration of the ruling of 1937. On February 4, 1939, the Bureau of Internal Revenue issued a new decision, in which they admitted the error made in 1937. In the decision of 1939 it was determined that an honorary officer may not in any real sense be regarded as an officer within the contemplation of section 1101 (a) (6). Unfortunately, however, the decision of 1939 in no way modified the error caused by the ruling of 1937 as it related to active officers who receive no compensation for their services.

In view of these facts, it is apparent that there must be an amendment to the Social Security Act to correct the wrong that is being done to organizations which were not intended to be included within the 3-percent tax provision.

Certainly the nature and noncommercial purpose of these organizations have been recognized for years as is evidenced by their exemption from the Federal income tax.

I introduce for reference to the proper committee a bill providing for amendment of the Internal Revenue Code with respect to the tax on employers of eight or more persons.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

(See Senate bill 2267, introduced by Mr. WILEY, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and appears under its appropriate heading.)

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

H. R. 4929. An act to amend the act of June 23, 1938 (52 Stat. 944); and

H. R. 5765. An act to authorize commissioning aviation cadets in the Naval and Marine Corps Reserves upon completion of training, and for other purposes.

CANCELATION OF CHARGES UNDER A RIVER AND HARBOR ACT—AMENDMENT

Mr. MALONEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 485) providing for the cancelation of certain charges under section 20 of the River and Harbor Act of March 3, 1899, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC WORKS AGENCY—AMENDMENT

Mr. BARBOUR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. VANDENBERG (for himself, Mr. BARBOUR, and Mr. TAFT) to the bill (S. 2202) to establish a Public Works Agency, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BARBOUR submitted an amendment proposing to increase the stated appropriation for the control and eradication of the diseases of tuberculosis and paratuberculosis of animals, avian tuberculosis, and Bang's disease of cattle, from $7,175,000 to $9,800,000, and also to increase the total appropriation, Salaries and Expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry, from $15,493,312 to $18,118,312, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5269, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, 1940, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PEPPER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5269, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, 1940, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 50, line 5, to strike out "$407,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$427,500"; and in the same line, to strike out "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000", so as to read:

Agricultural chemical investigations: For conducting the investigations contemplated by the act of May 15, 1862 (5 U. S. C. 511, 512), relating to the application of chemistry to agriculture; for the biological, chemical, physical, microscopical, and technological investigation of foods, feeds, drugs, plant and animal products, and substances used in the manufacture thereof; for investigations of the physiological effects and for the pharmacological testing of such products and of insecticides; for the investigation and development of methods for the manufacture of sugars, sugar sirups, and starches and the utilization of new agricultural materials for such purposes; for the technological investigation of the utilization of fruits and vegetables and for frozen pack investigations; for the investigation of chemicals for the control of noxious weeds and plants; and to cooperate with associations and scientific societies in the development of methods of analysis, $427,500, of which amount not to exceed $25,000 shall be available for the construction and equipment of an addition to the United States Citrus Products Laboratory, Winter Haven, Fla.

CALL OF CALENDAR DISPENSED WITH

The VICE PRESIDENT. The routine morning business is concluded. The consideration of bills on the calendar under rule VIII is in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the calling of the calendar be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

THE GOLDEN SPIKE CELEBRATION

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, at 11:30 a. m. on yesterday, Wednesday, April 26, 1939, at the White House, a key was pushed by President Roosevelt. Halfway across the continent, at Omaha, Nebr., that act of the Chief Executive resulted in opening a 4-day celebration of Golden Spike Days. This festival marks the seventieth anniversary of an event of unusual significance, for it was in 1869 that the steel bands stretching westward from the Missouri River across the wide expanse of prairie were joined with those that had crept eastward from the edge of the blue waters of the Pacific. The first transcontinental railroad, long a dream, had become a reality.

A golden spike was driven to mark completion of the great undertaking. That spike today is on exhibition in Omaha as a symbol of the consummation of one of the great achievements of history. The War between the States, which had but shortly before been fought to a conclusion, made certain that this Union was to be indissoluble. The successful construction of the Union Pacific Railroad, despite hostile Indians, the scorching heat of arid plains, and the almost impassable mountain ranges, demonstrated that this was to be one nation from coast to coast. It was an epoch in man's struggle to conquer space.

Ten years before, Abraham Lincoln and Maj. Gen. Grenville M. Dodge had stood together on the bluffs across the river from Omaha. Looking to the west as far as the eye could see, Lincoln marked the outline of the railroad that was to run from that terminus. In 1862 both Houses of Congress enacted legislation to aid in the construction of the road. Ground was broken toward the end of the following year. Neither Civil War, the frailties of human nature, nor obstacles that would have daunted the spirits of ordinary men, were sufficient to check the onward movement of this most useful instrumentality in man's progress.

Today the Union Pacific has few peers and no superiors among our great railway systems. Its many thousands of employees constitute one great family. The motto of all, from highest to the most lowly, is service of the best quality.

The country through which the Union Pacific makes its way from Omaha to the coast has witnessed a marvelous transformation. Only a beginning has been made. It is a fertile land, but it has one great need—water. The hardy pioneers who struggled to wring from the soil a decent living for their families, and who were so often frustrated by drought, would gaze with wonder on the stupendous dams that impound all available water to supply the needs of irrigation projects. Sections that were properly classed as part of the Great American Desert have been changed into garden spots. There is much yet to be done. Worthy sons of the original settlers are moving forward to greater accomplishments.

Thanks to the genius of Cecil DeMille, we of this day, and all future generations, have the glorious opportunity of viewing upon the screen, in dramatic and historically accurate presentation, the story of this record-breaking accomplishment. The world premiere picture, Union Pacific, is, in its way, as great a wonder as the building of the railroad itself. To our children, and to us who watch the drama unfold before our eyes, it cannot fail to bring a quickening of the pulse. We have a heritage for which our fathers endured every form of hardship. It is ours to preserve.

The significant celebration taking place this week in Omaha and the showing over the country of this picture, destined to rank as one of the greatest productions of all time, will do much to unify our people. For that reason, I have welcomed this opportunity to call these unique events to the consideration of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5324, to amend the National Housing Act, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That subsections (a) and (b) of section 2 of the National Housing Act, as amended, are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. (a) The Administrator is authorized and empowered upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to insure banks, trust companies, personal finance companies, mortgage companies, building and loan associations, installment lending companies, and other such financial institutions, which the Administrator finds to be qualified by experience or facilities and approves as eligible for credit insurance, against losses which they may sustain as a result of loans and advances of credit, and purchases of obligations representing loans and advances of credit, made by them on and after July 1, 1939, and prior to July 1, 1941, or such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation upon his determination that there no longer exists any necessity for such insurance in order to make ample credit available, for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs, and improvements upon or in connection with existing structures, and the building of new structures, upon urban, suburban, or rural real property (including the restoration, rehabilitation, rebuilding, and replacement of such improvements which have been damaged or destroyed by earthquake, conflagration, tornado, cyclone, flood, or other catastrophe), by the owners thereof or by lessees of such real property under a lease expiring not less than 6 months after the maturity of the loan or advance of credit. In no case shall the insurance granted by the Administrator under this section to any such financial institution on loans, advances of credit, and purchases made by such financial institution for such purposes on and after July 1, 1939, exceed 10 percent of the total amount of such loans, advances of credit, and purchases. The total liability which may be outstanding at any time plus the amount of claims paid in respect of all insurance heretofore and hereafter granted under this section and section 6, as amended, less the amount collected from insurance premiums and deposited in the Treasury of the United States under the provisions of subsection (f) of this section, shall not exceed in the aggregate $100,000,000.

"(b) No insurance shall be granted under this section to any such financial institution with respect to any obligation representing any such loan, advance of credit, or purchase by it (1) if the amount of such loan, advance of credit, or purchase exceeds $2,500; or (2) if such obligation has a maturity in excess of 3 years and 32 days, unless such loan, advance of credit, or purchase is for the purpose of financing the construction of a new structure for use in whole or in part for residential or agricultural purposes; or (3) unless the obligation bears such interest, has such maturity, and contains such other terms, conditions, and restrictions as the Administrator shall prescribe in order to make credit available for the purposes of this title."

SEC. 2. Section 2 of such act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(f) The Administrator shall fix a premium charge for the insurance hereafter granted under this title, and in the case of any obligation representing any loan, advance of credit, or purchase, such premium charge shall be an amount equivalent to one-half of 1 percent per annum of the net proceeds of such loan, advance of credit, or purchase, for the term of such obligation, and such premium charge shall be payable in advance by the financial institution and shall be paid at such time and in such manner as may be prescribed by the Administrator. The moneys derived from such premium charges shall be deposited in an account in the Treasury of the United States, which account shall be available for defraying the operating expenses of the Federal Housing Administration under this title, and any amounts in such account which are not needed for such purpose may be used for the payment of claims in connection with the insurance granted under this title.

"(g) The Administrator is authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title."

SEC. 3. Section 6 of such act, as amended, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. The provisions of sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act shall take effect on July 1, 1939.

SEC. 5. Section 203 (a) of the National Housing Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The Administrator is authorized, upon application by the mortgagee, to insure as hereinafter provided any mortgage offered to him which is eligible for insurance as hereinafter provided, and, upon such terms as the Administrator may prescribe, to make commitments for the insuring of such mortgages prior to the date of their execution or disbursement thereon: Provided, That the aggregate amount of principal obligations of all mortgages insured under this title and outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $3,000,000,000, except that with the approval of the President such aggregate amount may be increased to not to exceed $4,000,000,000: Provided further, That the aggregate amounts of principal obligations of all mortgages that cover property the construction of which was completed more than 1 year prior to the date of the application for insurance, and that are insured under this title after the effective date of this amendment and outstanding at any one time, shall not exceed 25 percent of the total amount of the principal obligations of mortgages with respect to which insurance may be granted under this title after such effective date: Provided further, That after July 1, 1941, no mortgages shall be insured that cover property the construction of which was completed more than 1 year prior to the date of the application for insurance, except mortgages that cover property which has been previously covered by a mortgage insured by the Administrator."

SEC. 6. Paragraph (3) of section 203 (b) of such act, as amended, is amended by striking out "July 1, 1939" and inserting in lieu thereof "July 1, 1941."

SEC. 7. Section 203 of such act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(e) Any contract of insurance heretofore or hereafter executed by the Administrator under this title shall be conclusive evidence of the eligibility of the mortgage for insurance, and the validity of any contract of insurance so executed shall be incontestable in the hands of an approved mortgagee from the date of the execution of such contract, except for fraud or misrepresentation on the part of such approved mortgagee.

"(f) No mortgage which in whole or in part refinances a then existing mortgage shall be insured under this section unless the mortgagor files with the application his certificate to the Administrator that prior to the making of the application the mortgagor applied to the holder of such existing mortgage for such refinancing and that, after reasonable opportunity such holder failed or refused to make a loan of a like amount and on as favorable terms as those of the loan secured by the mortgage offered for insurance after taking into account amortization provisions, commission, interest rate, mortgage insurance premium, and costs to the mortgagor for legal services, appraisal fees, title expenses, and similar charges."

SEC. 8. The last sentence of section 204 (a) of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "For the purpose of this subsection, the value of the mortgage shall be determined, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Administrator, by adding to the amount of the original principal obligation of the mortgage which was unpaid on the date of the institution of foreclosure proceedings, or on the date of the acquisition of the property after default other than by foreclosure, the amount of all payments which have been made by the mortgagee for taxes, ground rents, and water rates, which are liens prior to the mortgage, special assessments which are noted on the application for insurance or which become liens after the insurance of the mortgage, insurance on the mortgaged property, and any mortgage insurance premiums paid after either of such dates, and by deducting from such total amount any amount received on account of the mortgage after either of such dates, and any amount received as rent or other income from the property, less reasonable expenses incurred in handling the property, after either of such dates: Provided, That with respect to mortgages which are accepted for insurance prior to July 1, 1941, under section 203 (b) (2) (B) of this act, and which are foreclosed before there shall have been paid on account of the principal obligation of the mortgage a sum equal to 10 percent of the appraised value of the property as of the date the mortgage was accepted for insurance, there may be included in the debentures issued by the Administrator, on account of foreclosure costs actually paid by the mortgagee and approved by the Administrator an amount not in excess of 2 percent of the unpaid principal of the mortgage as of the date of the institution of foreclosure proceedings, but in no event in excess of $75."

SEC. 9. Section 204 (g) of such act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "The power to convey and to execute in the name of the Administrator deeds of conveyance, deeds of release, assignments and satisfactions of mortgages, and any other written instrument relating to real property or any interest therein heretofore or hereafter acquired by the Administrator pursuant to the provisions of this act, may be exercised by the Administrator or by any Assistant Administrator appointed by him, without the execution of any express delegation of power or power of attorney: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall be construed to prevent the Administrator from delegating such power by order or by power of attorney, in his discretion, to any officer, agent, or employee he may appoint."

SEC. 10. The last sentence of section 205 (b) of such act, as amended, is amended by inserting after "expenses incurred" the words "prior to July 1, 1939."

SEC. 11. The first sentence of section 207 (c) of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(c) To be eligible for insurance under this section a mortgage on any property or project shall involve a principal obligation in an amount—

"(1) Not to exceed $5,000,000; and

"(2) Not to exceed 80 percent of the amount which the Administrator estimates will be the value of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed: Provided, That such mortgage shall not in any event exceed the amount which the Administrator estimates will be the cost of the completed physical improvements on the property or project, exclusive of public utilities and streets, organization expenses and miscellaneous charges, during or incidental to construction; and

"(3) Not to exceed $1,350 per room for such part of such property or project as may be attributable to dwelling use.

The mortgage shall provide for complete amortization by periodic payments within such term as the Administrator shall prescribe, and shall bear interest (exclusive of premium charges for insurance) at not to exceed 4½ percent per annum on the amount of the principal obligation outstanding at any time."

SEC. 12. Title II of the National Housing Act, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"LABOR STANDARDS

"SEC. 212. (a) The Administrator shall not insure under section 207 or section 210 of this title, pursuant to any commitment to insure made subsequent to the date this section takes effect, a mortgage which covers property on which there is or is to be located a dwelling or dwellings, construction of which was commenced subsequent to the effective date of this section, unless the principal contractor files a certificate or certificates (at such times, in course of construction or otherwise, as the Administrator may prescribe) certifying that the laborers and mechanics employed in the construction of the dwelling or dwellings involved have been paid not less than the wages prevailing in the locality for work of a similar nature, as determined by the Secretary of Labor.

"(b) The Administrator is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

"(c) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, and for each fiscal year thereafter, a sum sufficient to meet all necessary expenses of the Department of Labor in making the determinations provided for in subsection (a)."

SEC. 13. The last sentence of section 301 (b) of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "If the Administrator is of the opinion that the establishment of such an association is desirable to provide a market for mortgages insured under title II and is in the public interest, that the incorporators transmitting the articles of association are responsible persons, and that such articles of association are satisfactory in all respects, he may issue or cause to be issued to such incorporators a certificate of approval, and the association shall become, as of the date of issuance of such certificate, a body corporate by the name set forth in its articles of association."

SEC. 14. Paragraph (4) of section 301 (c) of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(4) To conduct its business in any State of the United States, or in the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, or Puerto Rico, and to have one or more offices in such State, or in the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, or Puerto Rico, one of which offices shall be designated at the time of organization as its principal office."

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I shall make a very brief general statement concerning the operations of the Federal Housing Administration. Then, as the bill is read, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and I will be pleased to answer any questions that may be asked concerning the amendments which have been proposed by the committee.

As all Senators know, this bill is merely an amendment and extension of the Federal housing plan. Five years of operation of the F. H. A. have conclusively proved that the Federal Government and business can cooperate to their mutual advantage. All kinds of plans are now being submitted in Congress to improve the relationship between business and Government in order further to stimulate our economic recovery; but here is a Government agency that is actually cooperating with business and producing the desired stimulant. Billions of dollars have poured into the construction industry, into the railroads, the factories, mines, and lumber camps—profits to millions of stockholders who have invested in these industries, and wages for our workers. It is estimated that approximately 767,000,000 man-hours of work, at an average wage of $1 per hour, resulted last year from F. H. A. operations, 253,000,000 man-hours in construction work on the building site, and 514,000,000 man-hours off the site in the production of raw materials, in their fabrication, and in their transportation. All of this has resulted at a net appropriated expense to the Government during the past 5 years of only $49,000,000, a very small sum; a figure which includes operating expenses and unrecovered claims paid under title I, and all expenses of title II paid by allocation of funds from R. F. C.

The F. H. A. does not lend or grant any Government money. It is set up on sound insurance principles, and, like an insurance company, it is permitted to charge a premium to cover expenses and probable future losses. During the early years of the F. H. A. system, the premium income was insufficient to pay expenses; but now the F. H. A.'s current income from its mortgage insurance approximates the current expenses and losses on this major activity. During the current fiscal year the F. H. A. will pay approximately $7,500,000 of expenses out of its own premium income. The balance of $5,500,000, part of which is to cover title I expenses—that is, small houses and improvement loans—for which we formerly provided no premiums, is being paid out of R. F. C. funds. The balance of this year's income of about $6,000,000 will be added to the F. H. A. reserves for payment of future losses. The reserve funds, starting out with an original appropriation from Congress of only $10,000,000, now amount to approximately $24,000,000.

As the premiums on mortgages insured in the previous years are received each year, and as the premiums for new insurance are added, this income will continue to mount; and eventually the F. H. A. should be able to pay all the expenses of the mortgage-insurance system and set up adequate reserves for all future losses.

We are known all over the world as a nation of home owners; and every one of us knows to what extent you or I or any one of our neighbors will go in order to keep from losing our homes by foreclosure. Our people will deprive themselves of almost everything to keep their little homes intact.

When 1933 came, following a 4-year depression, and we authorized the organization of the H. O. L. C. to relieve the great distress of our home owners, we thought we had seen the worst possible demoralization of our mortgage credit structure. At that time the H. O. L. C. took over 15 percent of our total urban small-home mortgage debt. Since that time the H. O. L. C. have averaged a loss of 15 percent on the mortgages that they have had subsequently to foreclose and sell. This may be the worst collapse that this country will ever witness. I am not predicting, but let me tell you that mortgagees could, if necessary, foreclose and transfer to the F. H. A. 30 percent, or twice the proportion of mortgages that the H. O. L. C. refinanced. The F. H. A. could sustain that same average loss on the sale of each of these foreclosed properties that the H. O. L. C. has sustained, and pay every dollar of these losses out of its own premium and appraisal fee income. In other words, the F. H. A. can go through a real-estate collapse of twice the proportions of the 1929–33 collapse and have a sufficient income to cover all of its losses.

Here is a Government agency that is doing more at present than any other to stimulate the durable goods industry—without which, all economists agree, our national economy cannot be made lasting—at what should eventually prove to be an insignificant cost to the Government. It is private capital—private capital being invested by prospective home owners and being lent by banks, building and loan associations, and insurance companies—that is bringing about this great revival in the employment in the building and allied trades. The Government is merely making it safe for our lending institutions to make these loans by providing a medium for them to pool their risks on a Nation-wide scale. It is doing what any private credit insurance company would do for profit if it had sufficient capital and prestige to start with. This is the most effective and workable Government-business cooperative medium yet devised, and one the results of which have already been conclusively demonstrated.

F. H. A. facilities are available to any qualified lending institution in the country. That the lending institutions are availing themselves of this Government cooperation is attested by the following F. H. A. records: Under title I, which covers the insurance of repair and disaster loans, since the amendments of 1938, 3,187 banks have made loans, 135 building and loan associations, and 128 other institutions—a total of 3,450 institutions. Under title II, which covers mortgage insurance, 3,402 banks, 1,062 building and loan associations, 185 insurance companies, and 246 other institutions, or a total of 4,895 lending institutions, made insured-mortgage loans in 1938.

As everyone knows, the F. H. A. is not a political issue. Public opinion and the press are urging that we renew the life of the expiring sections of the National Housing Act. One of the leading Republican newspapers, the New York Herald Tribune, and the leading financial daily of the country, the Wall Street Journal, have during the past few months insistently urged that the Congress take immediate action to extend expiring sections of the act and to increase the authorized amount of mortgage insurance, so that builders of homes may be assured that favorable financing terms will be available in sufficient amount when the houses are completed. They point out that long strides have been made in the recovery of residential construction—from 54,000 units in 1933 to 346,000 in 1938. They point out that it would be extremely dangerous to the public interest to interfere at present in any way with the financing mechanism we have set up under the National Housing Act. This is not any issue of politics; it is sound economics and practical cooperation between business and Government.

I now desire to make a statement of the general results of F. H. A. operations.

SMALL-HOME MORTGAGES (TITLE II, SEC. 203)

In general, it may be said that during the period of F. H. A. operations the home-mortgage insurance system has accomplished the following results: (1) It has established the single, high percentage loan value, lone-term amortized mortgage as the standard form of home financing; (2) it has relegated the second mortgage to the background; (3) it has reduced home mortgage interest rates to the lowest point ever attained throughout the country; (4) it has provided for a regional inflow of home-mortgage funds to areas where these funds were most needed; (5) it has given the home mortgage superior investment qualities from the point of view of the lending institutions; (6) it has improved home mortgage lending practices through the F. H. A. underwriting organization and through its emphasis on the borrower's ability to pay, the character of the neighborhood, and the quality of design and construction; (7) it has stimulated activity in construction, employment, and business generally; (8) it has raised standards for the layout, design, and construction of low-priced homes, and discouraged jerry building; (9) it has made home ownership more practical, safer, and more economical for the average family.

RENTAL HOUSING PROJECTS (TITLE II, SECS. 207 AND 210)

The insurance of mortgages on large-scale rental housing projects is the only method of financing yet devised to replace the now disgraced and defunct guaranteed realty bond issues which were prevalent in the 1920's. The complete collapse of the realty bond market, and the publicity given to the malpractices indulged in in the financing of apartment houses make it appear doubtful that the guaranteed realty bond will ever be able to regain public favor.

The system of financing of large-scale rental projects under section 207 of the act is based upon an entirely different theory than that underlying the old pattern of first-, second-, and third-mortgage bonds. The new single mortgage financing, although for a higher percentage—maximum of 80 percent—of value, rests primarily on the earning capacity of the project. Sponsors must receive their profits from a long series of operations rather than from the "milking" of new properties, which was the customary practice under the old system. Sponsors under the old system skimmed all the profits out of the property while it was new and expenses were small, without setting up proper reserves for replacements, and in many cases without providing for any amortization of the mortgage indebtedness. After the cream was all skimmed off and expenses began to mount, the project was then dumped into the hands of the financing institutions. The F. H. A. system, on the other hand, has strict regulations as to the provision of adequate reserves, and definitely limits the dividends which the sponsors may withdraw during the period that the mortgage is outstanding.

In addition to providing a much more conservative method of financing of apartment houses in place of the guaranteed realty bond, and pointing the way to a revival of the large-scale residential construction program, the rental housing mortgage insurance program has also been instrumental in: (1) Demonstrating the soundness of rental projects planned and financed with a view to gradual amortization of the mortgage and steady returns on the equity investment over a period of years; (2) rendering obsolete, by force of example, the type of rental project planned primarily to make a showing in the first year or two of operation, but with little or no regard to longer range factors; (3) developing attractive examples of well-planned dwellings, with open surroundings, built to be rented at the outset to families with small incomes, and affording a striking contrast to the dreary, ill-arranged, and closely crowded quarters usually built in the past for the low-rental market.

MODERNIZATION AND REPAIR LOANS (TITLE I)

Title I was enacted as emergency legislation to stimulate employment in the building trades until such a time as the entire residential construction industry should be again placed on its feet. That this has been accomplished is evidenced by the fact that 1,833,185 property improvement loans insured by the F. H. A. have been used to improve dwellings inhabited by more than 6,500,000 persons, and to provide betterments for more than 200,000 farm, business, and institutional properties.

GENERAL COMMENTS—ESTIMATED AMOUNT OF EMPLOYMENT

All in all, the 4½ years' credit insurance activities have created employment for millions of workers, and have thereby reduced the burden on the Public Treasury for relief, contributed to improved living standards, and made home ownership easier and more secure.

Based on the volume of mortgages insured under title II and the notes insured under title I, it is estimated that approximately 767,000,000 man-hours of employment in the building and allied trades were created during 1938 as a result of F. H. A. operations. Of this amount, approximately 253,000,000 man-hours were employed directly on the site. This estimate is based on the volume of business transacted by the F. H. A. under each of the titles, and on the assumption that 35 percent of the cost of construction is spent on labor on the site, and that the average wage paid was $1 per hour.

The number of man-hours estimated to have been employed on the site during 1938 as a result of title I operations was 76,000,000, resulting from section 203, 160,000,000 man-hours, and from sections 207 and 210, 17,000,000 man-hours.

Based on the Department of Labor studies that approximately 2½ hours are spent off the site for each hour on the site in the construction of new houses, and on an arbitrary assumption that 1 hour is spent off the site for each hour spent on the site in the repair of properties, it is estimated that approximately 514,000,000 man-hours resulted off the site. The man-hours off the site consist of employment in the production of raw material, in the fabrication and in the transportation of the finished building material to each of the respective building sites.

All this has been accomplished by the constructive use of private credit, at relatively little cost to the Government, and has put men, money, and organizations to work in producing better housing that the American people so urgently need.

Mr. President, in my judgment, the greatest contribution the F. H. A. has made has been in bringing down the rates of interest charged those who build new homes. I think it would be fair to say that the average rate was somewhere around 7 percent before the F. H. A. came into the market. Now it cannot exceed 5 percent, and in the larger centers, such as New York, Chicago, Detroit, and Cleveland, the rate is down to as low as 4¼ percent.

Secondly, the F. H. A. affects a field of unemployed capital which has not heretofore been used in building construction; that is, the tremendously large cash balances which exist in the banks, large and small, throughout the country. By the use of F. H. A. insurance the banks are able to make loans upon paper eligible for rediscount at the Federal Reserve banks on favorable terms.

Mr. President, this is all I shall have to say on the general propositions covered by the bill. I shall be very pleased, as the bill is read by sections, to answer any questions Senators may ask concerning it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan a question about the bill. Does the bill make provision for payment of wages at prevailing rates on construction covered by the terms of the bill?

Mr. BROWN. The committee considered that matter very carefully. There were three proposals before the committee. One was to apply the prevailing-wage principle to all titles of the bill; the second was to eliminate it entirely—that is the existing status, as the Senator knows—and, third, to provide that the prevailing wage should apply to the construction of houses upon which loans of $16,000 or more were made, and to all large-scale apartment-house construction. At the present time, historically speaking, the prevailing wage applies, through the efforts of the union organizations themselves, to about 60 percent of construction on properties insured by the F. H. A. Under the amendment reported by the committee, I am informed by the F. H. A. statisticians the prevailing-wage policy will apply to between 80 and 90 percent of all construction.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator for his very illuminating statement. Two years ago I sought to have this principle incorporated in the housing measure then before the Senate and met with very substantial opposition. In fact, it was stated that if the principle were embodied in the law it would make it unworkable. I am, therefore, very much gratified to find that the principle has been admitted and that the provisions which the Senator from Michigan describes cover the overwhelming part of the work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, apropos the question just propounded by the Senator from Massachusetts, I wish to inquire—and this is not a critical observation—upon what basis it is conceived to be proper for the F. H. A. to determine the hours of labor and the rates of wages to be paid. As I understand, the F. H. A. merely guarantees mortgages which may be placed.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the Government is a contingent endorser upon the obligations of home builders.

Mr. KING. But if A desires to purchase a house, and makes satisfactory arrangements with a bank to obtain $5,000, provided there is a guaranty by the F. H. A., is there an obligation resting upon the F. H. A. to become a party to the contract which is made with the bank and determine the details under which the loan shall be made?

Mr. BROWN. I wish to make it clear to the distinguished Senator from Utah that this principle does not apply to title I, which covers the small houses, or modernization; it does not apply to the class of loans made on houses which cost $20,000 or less. It is mainly applicable in the large industrial cities of the country. The theory is that if the help of the Government is the vital factor—and it is—in enabling the builder of the small house to get a loan, since the Government comes in and takes the risk, a reasonable standard of wages should be required of the builder who applies to the Government for aid. That is the theory back of it.

I will say to the Senator that I was one of those who voted against the Lodge amendment last year. I consider that the proposal drafted by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], and myself as a subcommittee, the compromise that was accepted by the committee, is a reasonable and fair compromise of a difficult problem.

The House passed a bill which did not contain the prevailing-wage provision. If the pending bill is passed, the prevailing wage will apply to the types of construction I have outlined to the Senator. The bill does not impose a "closed shop," I wish the Senator to know. It is not a case of insisting that union labor shall be required, but that the prevailing wage in the locality shall be paid on the large-scale projects. It seems to me that that is a reasonable and fair requirement when the Government is attempting to bring about a high standard of wages throughout the construction industries. I have become convinced since last year that it is a desirable thing to do.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if experience thus far has demonstrated the wisdom of the Government furnishing this guaranty with respect to the construction of large apartment houses or hotels or buildings of similar character? It seems to me if the Government is to become a banker or fountain of credit in connection with the construction of houses, it should rather stimulate home ownership than furnish money for the construction of large apartment houses, hotels, and structures of like character.

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator that the rents that may be charged by those who build the large-scale projects are so limited by the provisions, not only of existing law but of the amendment proposed by the pending bill, that no large profits can possibly be made out of the contemplated construction. I think it is just as vital to provide good housing in the larger cities of the country as it is in the smaller localities, and we reach a class of people by the large-scale housing proposal that could not be helped if they had to construct individual houses for themselves.

Mr. KING. Has the F. H. A. furnished any statistics showing the number and character of obligations incurred in the construction of hotels, apartment houses, and so forth?

Mr. BROWN. There are no hotels covered by this proposal at all. It covers solely apartment houses. Up to date the total amount is not very large. It is $83,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the total number of the larger projects undertaken under this law throughout the country is not to exceed 100.

Mr. BROWN. One hundred million dollars?

Mr. BARKLEY. One hundred projects.

Mr. BROWN. Yes; one hundred projects, costing $83,000,000.

Mr. KING. And what is the experience with respect to the loans or guaranty for the larger units?

Mr. BROWN. So far there has not been 1 cent of loss, but, of course, to be perfectly fair, it is not likely there would be any loss in the early stages, because the houses are new. But, as I said in my general statement, there could be a loss of around 30 percent and still the insurance fund would be sound.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator concludes I wish he would explain why the recommendation made by the President on November 29, 1937, has not been observed. The recommendation is as follows:

> In connection with these changes, I would suggest that the Congress eventually limit the insurance of mortgages to housing on which the application for mortgage insurance is approved prior to the beginning of construction.

Has that recommendation been observed?

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator that I think that is generally the present policy of the F. H. A.

Mr. KING. I may say that Mr. McDonald stated in his testimony on November 30, 1937, as follows:

> We desire to eliminate that (old financing). After July 1, 1939, F. H. A. will drop out of existing construction, except houses which it has previously insured and of which it may be in possession or have to accept after foreclosure.

Mr. BROWN. I think a great majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency agreed with that view at the time the hearings were opened. I myself was very strongly of that opinion, and I think 16 of the 20 members of the committee also held that view. But we became convinced that the mortgage market itself might be seriously affected if we took F. H. A. entirely out of existing construction; and I myself offered an amendment, which was amended somewhat and eventually accepted, providing that not more than 25 percent of the remaining authorization—by "remaining authorization," I mean the total of insurance that may be granted—could be used to insure mortgages on existing construction. So only that amount may be so used. As a matter of practice the total amount used to refinance existing mortgages up to this time is about 12 percent.

Let me say to the Senator from Utah that that is a stabilizing factor in the mortgage market. It is desirable from this standpoint. When a man wants to build a new house, to step up a little bit higher in his standard of living, he has to sell his old house in order to aid in the financing of the new house, and in that case it is necessary that he should apply to the F. H. A. for a loan on his old house in order that he may sell it on favorable terms to a purchaser. In that respect it is somewhat similar to the automobile business. But we have carefully limited it to 25 percent of the remaining authorization available for insurance.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator believe that the making of loans to owners of houses which have already been constructed will militate against activities in the construction of new houses, and make the Federal Government really a broker, as well as a loaning agency, to deal with houses which are already constructed? My understanding of the purpose of the F. H. A. was to induce the construction of homes, particularly for those persons of modest means; it was not to insure old properties and to become a lending agency for carrying old obligations. It seems to me the purpose for which the F. H. A. was organized, namely, as I have indicated, to aid in building residences because there was a shortage of homes, is disregarded, and the F. H. A. is to be converted into a purchasing agency of thousands or perhaps tens of thousands of old houses in a general real-estate and brokerage organization.

Mr. BROWN. Let me say first that the standards which the F. H. A. requires for loans of that kind are so high that the danger of loss is very slight. Secondly, I want the Senator to see that by restricting the funds which may be so used to 25 percent of the remaining funds available—whereas heretofore 100 percent of those funds were available for insurance of existing mortgages—we have made a very great improvement in the law under the theory which the Senator expounds. I think the new measure is very much better than the present law; but I believe that, in order to have some influence upon the interest rates which are charged people throughout the country—and the Senator knows that we are in a period of very low interest rates—we ought to do something toward keeping such rates down to somewhere around 5 percent, and the Government is a factor in that situation.

With reference to the suggestion that the mortgages would be taken from building and loan associations, insurance companies, and banks, I remind the Senator that an amendment adopted by the House which is known as the Spence amendment, having been offered by Representative SPENCE, of Kentucky, requires that before the mortgage on an existing house may be insured by F. H. A., there must be a showing made that the person cannot refinance the mortgage through the agency which has heretofore financed it. That provision would prevent the unloading of these mortgages on the Government by building and loan associations, insurance companies, and so on, and would prevent the borrowers from transferring them to the Government. If the borrower can get reasonably favorable terms the F. H. A. cannot refinance the existing mortgage.

Mr. KING. I inquire of the Senator whether or not it would be refinanced if the owner, when he got rid of his old house, did not contemplate constructing a new one through the F. H. A.?

Mr. BROWN. It is possible; cases of that kind exist; but that is merely a sort of a governor which we endeavor to place upon the matter of interest rates. We do not want to go back to the 7-percent interest rate, and I think by cutting it down to 5 percent or 4½ percent we are doing a very good thing for the country, and we are employing idle funds of financial institutions that otherwise would not be risked in that manner.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that under the plan which the Senator has just explained the Government is becoming a conduit through which will be discharged obligations upon old houses, and the owners of old houses who will get rid of them by unloading them upon the Federal Government at such values as may be determined by the F. H. A.

Mr. BROWN. I do not share the Senator's apprehension at all, because the standards of the F. H. A., which it requires and sets down as a basis upon which the mortgages are made, are so high that I have no fear as to that particular problem. The record up to date in that respect reassures me that the F. H. A. is an institution whose losses will be very slight if any.

Mr. KING. It seems to me, Mr. President, that in view of the changed attitude, as I understand, of the F. H. A. from the position which it occupied when first established, we are now providing for the Federal Government to bail out the obligations of persons upon their homes and real estate, when they cannot, perhaps, obtain loans from other organizations or financial agencies. The F. H. A. may ultimately be in the unsatisfactory position occupied by the H. O. L. C. which bailed out worthless paper and took over thousands of properties which were of little or no value. This resulted, as I am informed, in a loss of at least 25 percent of the three or four billion dollars of Federal funds supplied by the Federal Government.

Mr. BROWN. As the Senator remembers, in the case of the H. O. L. C., the mortgage had to be a distress mortgage. It had to be in default. No investigation was made into the ability of the mortgagors to pay their mortgages. The F. H. A. on the other hand will not take a mortgage in default. It will not take a mortgage unless it can examine into the earning power and the wages received by the mortgagor and be reasonably sure that he will be able to pay. Of course, the F. H. A. does not insure on the same basis, as to security and valuation, on which the H. O. L. C. did. The H. O. L. C. Act was an emergency measure. I do not think the F. H. A. Act is an emergency measure. With about $1,800,000,000 of insurance, the loss to date has been $174,000, which is very inconsequential.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator has answered my questions, but——

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say that, in addition there is a $22,000,000 reserve fund which has not been touched.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that the Senator is ignoring what is so palpable, namely, that there are perhaps 4,000 organizations which deal in real estate transactions and extend credit to owners of all forms of real estate. These organizations are in a position to extend credit to owners of real estate, to aid in the building of homes and apartment houses. The Federal Government is becoming the money lender, the private banker, the source of credit, for private enterprises, and in so doing is competing with many forms of private endeavor. It seems to me that we are entering a field which was not contemplated when the original F. H. A. Act was enacted, and that the F. H. A. is becoming a purchaser or insurer of all sorts of property, including homes, some of which were erected many, many years ago.

Mr. BROWN. Assume that the Senator is correct, will he not give the Banking and Currency Committee credit for eliminating 75 percent of the evil which he thinks he sees? I do not think it is an evil, but, under the proposed legislation, we would be in a very much better position than we are under the existing law.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly, the committee now wears a bright crown by reason of that achievement; but I think it would be a little brighter and more vivid if the committee had gone to the extent of 100 percent.

Mr. BROWN. I have argued with the Senator, and I do not think either of us can further enlighten the other. However, after hearing fully from the Home Owners' Loan Corporation head, Mr. Fahey, who took the same position the Senator takes, from many real-estate experts, many building and loan association representatives, and from the F. H. A. authorities themselves, it was the considered judgment of the committee that we ought to continue to do a little of this type of financing in order to keep interest rates down, and in order to tap resources in a great many banks in small towns and in large cities, which can make eligible loans. I mean eligible in the sense of converting them into cash at the Federal Reserve bank in case of necessity. When we started the discussion not every member of the committee, but the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY], the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], myself, and many others—the majority of the committee—felt as does the Senator. All I can say is that we became convinced; we changed our minds on the subject, and decided that we ought to limit the amount of insurance considerably; but that we ought not to eliminate it entirely. Every Senator was not so convinced, but the great majority of the committee was. All I can say to the Senator is that it seems to me that the proposed legislation represents the opinions of those of us on the committee who have been with the problem since its origin. I was on the House committee when the original bill was introduced. Nearly all the Senators to whom I have referred have had long experience with the problem. We have come to the general conclusion that it is best to continue some insurance of existing construction.

Mr. KING. I desire to pay the Senator a compliment by stating that any measure which receives his earnest support has gone a long way toward its goal.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask another question. Is it not a fact that the F. H. A. still has approximately $1,300,000,000 of available capital, or authorized capital?

Mr. BROWN. Does the Senator mean under existing law?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator is very nearly correct. I read Mr. McDonald's testimony this morning. His estimate was that by July of 1940 the $3,000,000,000 would be used up. As the Senator knows, we have added $1,000,000,000 which may be used if the President thinks the necessity requires it. Again, I will say to the Senator that the original proposal was that the amount should be increased to $6,000,000,000. We reduced that amount to an outside limit of $4,000,000,000, the last billion of which may be used only if the President thinks it should be used. Again I say that I think we did a pretty good job.

Mr. KING. I appreciate that action of the committee. I think the recommendation of Mr. McDonald and his organization for a $6,000,000,000 authorization should not be granted. As I read this recommendation, it seemed to me that back of it was the purpose to make the F. H. A. a permanent institution. If it could obtain $6,000,000,000 by turning it over year in and year out, it could be made a permament organization, to that degree upsetting, if I may be permitted the language of the street, the activities of legitimate banking institutions, lending agencies, and building and loan organizations, which for many years have supplied billions of dollars to the housing industry and have furnished homes to millions of people. It seems to me that the demand for $6,000,000,000 is unwarranted. Having now reduced the amount to $1,000,000,000 in excess of the $3,000,000,000, and still having $1,300,000,000 available, I believe we might wait until 1940 to see whether or not the experiences up to that time justify any further increase of the capital. Undoubtedly changes will occur, and it would be well to wait until 1940 to see whether the experiences up to that time warrant further augmentation of the capital.

Mr. BROWN. The present proposal fixes the date at July 1, 1941. The Congress which will convene in January of 1941 probably should take up the problem at that time; and it seems to me that we ought not to be concerned with it in 1940. That was the general idea back of extending the authorization to the full $3,000,000,000, with $1,000,000,000 more if the President should desire to use it. Again I say to the Senator that the result was a compromise of conflicting views, and I think a fairly reasonable one.

Mr. KING. I do not agree with the conclusion of the committee. I think that at this time we ought not to increase the capital or change the law except in a few particulars which would improve it. May I ask what disposition was made of the authority which was at one time granted to make loans for internal improvements in houses?

Mr. BROWN. Title I is the title to which the Senator refers. That was the small housing and modernization provision.

Mr. KING. I was asking about the provisions of title I, under which loans were made for electric lights and other fixtures and improvements within the house. Is it proposed to continue that authority?

Mr. BROWN. Nothing of that kind may be done under the present law. I think the modernization would refer pretty generally to what we call fixtures. By "fixtures" I mean the installation of a furnace or other heating plant, or the installation of a new bathroom. However, it does not apply to washing machines, refrigerators, sewing machines, or movables of that character. The basis for a loan is an improvement to the real estate rather than personal property and movables which may be brought in and taken out.

Mr. KING. What has been the experience of the F. H. A. with respect to loans upon movables and fixtures?

Mr. BROWN. Not very good.

Mr. KING. The reason I make the inquiry is that many complaints have come to me that persons who sold so-called fixtures and improvements filed liens on the property; and there has been controversy and litigation growing out of such transactions, resulting in losses to the F. H. A. and, of course, to the Government.

Mr. BROWN. That not only is out of the amendments which are pending in the Senate, but it has not been in the law for over a year; it is not in the existing law.

I wish to advise the Senator as to another improvement we made to title I. We have imposed a one-half of 1 percent insurance premium on the lending institutions, the banks, the building and loan associations, which will further reduce the losses. We do not know whether or not that rate will take care of all of them, but we did not want to go too far and make it 1 percent because we feared it might discourage loans. However, we have so written the statute that that burden falls on the financial institutions and not on the borrower.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that the hearings on the bill disclosed that the losses for these so-called modernization improvement loans amount to some twelve or fifteen million dollars. If we are to rewrite the law or adopt amendments to the existing law, we should eliminate entirely the provisions which have caused so much controversy and litigation and which have resulted in loss to the Government.

Mr. President, I have indicated some objections to the bill under consideration and have adverted to the fact that it seems to me that an attempt is being made to perpetuate the F. H. A. Conceding that its accomplishments call for commendation, there is no reason for increasing its capacity and prolonging its period of existence beyond the original plan.

We have discovered that agencies created for temporary purposes claim immortality and by legislation attempt to secure an indefinite prolongation of their lives. Indeed, many Federal organizations not only have their lives prolonged but the field of their activities greatly enlarged. Bureaus are always greedy for power, and we frequently find organizations of rather limited extent expanding until they assume very large and in some cases very dangerous proportions.

The F. H. A., as I have indicated, has more than a billion dollars available, and when that is expended, if it is deemed wise by Congress, and Congress will meet again in January, further additions to its capacity may be made.

The indebtedness of the Government has reached not only stupendous proportions, but, as many believe, alarming proportions, and notwithstanding the billions of dollars of indebtedness, Congress, as I have upon many occasions stated, is recklessly making further expenditures. There seems to be no limit upon the demands which are being made upon the Federal Treasury. These demands ignore the fact that notwithstanding the heavy taxes, the deficits are increasing and will soon reach the high mark of $25,000,000,000, and the direct appropriations between $10,000,000,000 and $12,000,000,000, and the authorizations several billion dollars more.

The Federal Government is becoming a huge banking and credit agency, and when credit is extended to corporations or railroads, or for agricultural purposes, demands are made that the Federal Government supply credit to individuals and to every form of private enterprise. There must be a change in the policy of the Federal Government. If not, its credit will soon be greatly impaired and it will be unable to meet the demands which are being made upon it and the obligations which it has incurred.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, I intended, when I had the floor speaking upon House bill 5324, to amend the National Housing Act and for other purposes, to ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a statement presented by the United States Build- and Loan League. In offering the statement it is not with the intention of endorsing all of the statements contained therein, but for the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Utah will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by him.

The statement referred to is as follows:

On behalf of the building, savings, and loan associations of the United States, we wish to record our opposition to sections 2 and 3 of H. R. 3232 and S. 1097, which proposes to amend title II of the National Housing Act.

These associations loaned approximately $900,000,000 on home mortgages in 1937 and $800,000,000 in 1938.[1] Admittedly, about 10 percent of this volume has been made on the F. H. A. plan. Much of this 10 percent has been done reluctantly and has been forced by the extensive use of Government funds (drawn from R. F. C.) to promote the F. H. A. plan and by the 80- and 90-percent loans which borrowers could secure by that means. Savings and loan associations have successfully competed with both the 9.7 percent interest charges on F. H. A. title I loans and the 5½-percent cost to the borrower of title II loans.

Our basic objection to section 2 of H. R. 3232 and S. 1097 is that our thousands of community institutions are being hampered and injured in their activities by foreign lenders and direct Government purchases of F. H. A. insured mortgages. If it is desirable to encourage and strengthen private businesses in individual communities, the activities of the F. H. A. in insuring mortgages on existing property should be terminated on July 1, as now provided in the statute. We raise no question regarding the insurance of mortgages for new construction, because we feel it is better to assist and subsidize employment than to provide relief for unemployment. Promotional subsidies and ultimate losses on the part of the Government are possibly justified in creating new housing, but cannot be justified by activities which merely raid the portfolios of existing private institutions and use Government credit to endorse existing private debts.

That these associations operate in every urban community of the United States is well known to every Member of Congress. It is also well known that they encourage the development of a program of thrift, as well as a sound plan for the promotion of home ownership. It is a serious question for the Government to encourage the raiding of their portfolios and promote activities which injure them, with little compensating public benefit. These institutions are local, private community enterprises, organized and operated by the people in their respective communities to promote thrift and home ownership. They lend substantially all of the savings invested in them by some 6,000,000 people on home mortgages, upon a plan which has been considered fair and favorable to the borrower and which has been adopted by the F. H. A.

Attached are two tables, the first showing the number, assets, membership, and distribution of savings-and-loan associations, and the second reproducing the official 1937–38 loan volume statistics of these associations.

The wisdom or necessity for the employment of an additional $3,000,000,000 of Government credit at this time to endorse the notes of individual debtors is highly debatable, and we believe the proposal should be given the most serious scrutiny by the Congress. After more than 4 years of operation of title II, the F. H. A. has insured, and is committed to insure, mortgages totaling $1,650,000,000, of which approximately one-half was insurance of existing mortgages, and therefore did not promote employment or new housing.[2] It mainly encouraged and facilitated a brokerage system of selling mortgages to foreign lenders and to the Government in competition with local private savings institutions. The present revolving authorization, of which a billion and one-third remains, plus repayments, should be quite adequate to continue F. H. A. activities in the new-construction field. A further authorization to enable them to continue the refinancing of existing debts we believe to be an unnecessary use of Government credit.

Section 2, in rewriting section 203 (a) of the present National Housing Act, proposes that it will be the permanent policy of the Government to insure mortgages on existing construction. The present act reads: "After July 1, 1939, no mortgages shall be insured except mortgages approved prior to construction." The new language proposes to eliminate entirely this restriction.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST SECTION 2 AND FOR RETENTION OF PRESENT LANGUAGE

1. Increasing the authorization of amount which may be insured from three billion to six billion doubles the authorized liability or obligation of the Government on these private debts. The Government guaranty or endorsement runs solely to the benefit of private financial institutions, principally commercial banks and trust companies.

2. The President of the United States, in his message to Congress on November 29, 1937, suggested that the Government cease endorsing or guaranteeing mortgages on existing construction in the following language:

"In connection with these changes, I would suggest that the Congress eventually limit the insurance of mortgages to housing on which the application for mortgage insurance is approved prior to the beginning of construction."

F. H. A. Administrator Stewart McDonald, testifying before the House Banking and Currency Committee, November 30, 1937, further said as follows:

"We desire to eliminate that (old financing). After July 1, 1939, F. H. A. will drop out of existing construction, except houses which it has previously insured and of which it may be in possession or have to accept after foreclosure * * *."

Making the insurance of refinancing loans a matter of permanent policy is thus contrary to the stated intention of the President and of the Federal Housing Administration itself the last time it requested further aid from Congress.

3. The Government may be justified in assuming substantial risks in connection with mortgages on new construction because stimulating new construction increases employment in the building trades and in the building-material industries. There is no such compensating advantage in the case of other loans. Insuring these loans merely provides a device for what is virtually direct Government lending through the Reconstruction Finance Mortgage Co. or the Federal National Mortgage Association operated by the R. F. C. It further encourages the holding of mortgages on homes not by local institutions designed to foster home ownership but rather by distant investors largely in the eastern capital markets who have no interest in working out community home ownership problems in the event of another financial crisis. It encourages foreclosure by arbitrary rules in contrast to the ability of a local institution to help the home owner in distress work out his problems.

The present authorized $3,000,000,000 would be adequate, at least for a long period of time, if F. H. A. operations were confined to new construction. Continuing these refinancing operations at a time when ample credit is available for them in every community is the only reason for increasing the liability of the Government to $6,000,000,000 with its attendant possible loss.

4. The theory of the F. H. A. was to encourage private capital and avoid Government outlays or direct Government loans. A substantial portion of the loans insured by the F. H. A. are being purchased outright by the R. F. C. and by the Federal National Mortgage Association operated by it. This amounts to direct Government lending in competition with existing institutions.

It is further unsound because mortgages are being made and sold to the Government which prudent and experienced private lenders do not consider safe risks for savings funds nor sound transactions for the borrowers. The whole real-estate field is being endangered with the conditions which brought on the great real-estate crash in the late twenties, namely, excessive loans, too small equities, and accompanying policies and practices which inevitably multiply the difficulties of home owners and others in a future depression.

Section 3 adds the words "or assigned" so that mortgages may be originated by brokers or others not approved mortgagees and may be insured upon assignment to an approved mortgagee. This renders the field wide open to the individual, real-estate man, or small operator who cannot qualify.

[2] For figures on insurance operations as of December 31, 1938, see vol. III, No. 8, p. 17, February 1939 Portfolio, published by the Federal Housing Administration. In fact, only a billion and one-third of the present $3,000,000,000 authorization has been used, because these figures indicate only $1,363,000,000 of premium-paying mortgages and $281,000,000 of outstanding commitments, a portion of which may become premium-paying mortgages and thus increase the total of the authorization used, and a portion of which may expire.

ARGUMENTS AGAINST SECTION 3

One of two theories must be chosen by those responsible for home-financing policies in the United States. Are we to encourage and develop community institutions, such as savings banks, savings, building and loan associations, and the like, or shall the mortgages be made by individuals, builders, or developers, regardless of their financial strength and responsibility, and sold to the Government or foreign financial concerns? The system of community institutions, reinvesting community savings and capital in the community, stood the test best in the recent depression, and is the most logical and most American, and least paternalistic policy and procedure. Some of our people think that it is a serious matter to open up the making of these loans to an unlimited group of individuals, firms, or dealers who do not have adequate capital or the responsibility of supervised financial institutions.

Section 3 throws this principle aside and eliminates the concept of community and institutional responsibility by encouraging a mortgage brokerage or buying and selling system in the home financing activities of the Nation.

Section 5 is a combination section with section 3, which protects the buyer of insured mortgages from any fraud or misrepresentation practiced upon the home owner or borrower in order to expedite the trafficking in mortgage loans. This incontestability provision protects only the approved mortgagee, not the Government nor the mortgagor.

Section 4, by dropping out the words "until July 1, 1939," authorizes the indefinite continuation of the 25-year term loans.

Many do not believe that 25-year amortization is in the interest of either the borrower or the lender and would prefer to see the amortization limit 20 years. Even this length of amortization should be confined to the more permanent and durable construction.

There are no objections to other items in the bill, from the point of view of building, savings and loan associations.

The United States Building and Loan League represents over 4,000 individual institutions and 47 affiliated State organizations, and includes in its membership over 80 percent of the assets of the community thrift and home financing institutions of the savings and loan type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute for the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I agreed to yield next to the Senator from North Carolina, and now do so.

Mr. BAILEY. I greatly admire, Mr. President, the courage of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but I think any effort now attempted to resist money lending by the United States Government is utterly futile.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not intend to resist this proposed legislation. The fact is that this Republic has gone into the money-lending business. It started in gradually under the conception of an emergency. Now we are going where any democracy must go whenever it starts into money-lending business; we are in the position of having to go all the way. That is "equality under the law." What we have here now is just another step by way of enlargement.

We complain of the banks for not lending, but there is no bank on earth that can compete with the United States Government as a money lender. We complain of the building and loan associations, but the building and loan associations cannot compete with the great Government of the United States, which not only has the power to tax and control but also the power to issue money—and it is issuing money—and the unlimited power, as some think, although I do not think so, to borrow money. Having gone as far as we have gone, we may as well make up our minds that we must go the rest of the way and lend to anybody and everybody on any pretext.

This is a democracy; we have opened the doors of the Treasury to the democracy. This is a self-government, a people's government, and we must lend the people such money as they ask for, on such security as they require, and at such rates as they demand or answer to them at the polls for "the deeds done in the body" of the United States Senate. There is no question what our answer will be.

The proposition we have here now—and this is what I wish to address my question to—is that we shall not only lend a man more money on a building project than any bank on earth would lend or any lawyer would lend for a client, but we shall lend a man money to build a house and then lend him money on the increased value of the land created by the loan. I do not know what safeguards are going to be put around that proposal. I will agree that the land goes up in value, but I maintain that any lender ought to be protected by an equity resting in the borrower. What is the equity here? I wish to understand that clearly.

I know what is going on in my State from the correspondence which I receive. I can borrow under this act $100,000 to build an apartment house. I put that loan on the land. I get the land, say, for $10,000, and I have the land value lifted up to $30,000. That becomes my security notwithstanding that the lender of the money makes that possible. Then, under the system, the Government collects the rent for a period of years; the property is paid for; and ultimately I get the property. That is a very fine speculation for me. I do not even have to become personally responsible. Say I am worth $25,000. I can create a little corporation that is worth nothing, and operate with the F. H. A. through that. So Uncle Sam not only lends the money but also "holds the bag." I wonder that everybody on earth is not engaging in this business. Many persons in my State are doing so. The proposition is to speculate on the credit of the United States, the speculator risking nothing himself—that is a fine speculation—taking the chance at the end of a period of years of getting title to a property worth $100,000 without risk. I inquire if the opportunity is available to United States Senators?

Mr. BROWN. I think it is.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well; I am glad to hear it. That is some more "equality under the law." As I take it, the Members of the other House likewise may enjoy the privilege.

Mr. President, that is what we have come to in our money-lending policy in this country; but I am not resisting it. Facilis descensus Averni. Let us go.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from North Carolina will maintain his powers of resistance. I think they are very valuable to the Senate, to the Congress, and to the country. I should be very sorry if I learned that the Senator from North Carolina had been beaten into submission and was not going to continue his resistance to what he thinks are wrongful policies of the Government, because I think he has made very valuable contributions in that respect.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I would resist further but for the parable that is brought to us from history of the king who undertook to beat back the waves of the sea. He has been put down as a fool, I understand, ever since. We are dealing now with the waves of the sea of democracy, and having found a way to the Treasury of the United States they will never be turned back until that Treasury is bankrupt and the people are ruined as a consequence. No, I shall not resist.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few things suggested to me by the Senator's statement. In the first place, of course, he recognizes, I am sure—and yet his language might be susceptible of another construction—that the Government itself makes no loans whatsoever under this bill. If we are sinning in that respect, I think the Federal Housing Authority is the least sinner of any of the Government institutions. I think the Senator puts his finger on the strongest point of resistance rather than the weakest one.

Mr. BAILEY. But does not the Government guarantee the loans?

Mr. BROWN. The Government guarantees the loans——

Mr. BAILEY. Then, what is the difference?

Mr. BROWN. But it has an insurance premium, it has reserves, and adopts a policy which, so far, has resulted in but infinitesimal losses.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, but now the Government is a guarantor. My point is it guarantees my loan and lets me out. I can tomorrow under this measure borrow a hundred thousand dollars, putting up just a little money, buy the land, and then have the land valued at twice what I paid for it in order to lift the amount guaranteed by the Government. I take it that that is perfectly clear. The Government does lend the money in the sense that there is not an institution on earth that would advance it except upon dependence and reliance upon the Government guaranty. There cannot be any doubt about that.

I ask my friend, the distinguished Senator from Michigan, a question. I wish to know what is the protection as against valuing the land not at the purchase price paid by the borrower but at the increased speculative value added by the expenditure of the guaranteed money of the United States upon the property? I should like to know about that. I understand that the other House passed an amendment undertaking to limit the loan, so far as land is concerned, to the purchase price, but here we propose to let a man buy land for $10,000 and then borrow $15,000 on it because a house is to be erected on it.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator could not do that under the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator tell me just what I could do under that amendment?

Mr. BROWN. I will try to make that matter clear to the Senator. The Senator is referring to the so-called Cochran amendment, which was adopted by the House. We adopted in the Senate committee an amendment which we think is an improvement on the Cochran amendment, and made it a little more specific in its language, so that there can be no doubt as to what it means.

Under our amendment the mortgage may not in any circumstances exceed the cost of the improvements on the land, the completed structure. The borrower must not only put in his land—and the valuation of his land may not be included in the mortgage itself—but he must put in the sewerage; he must put in the water; he must put in all of the outside incidental improvements before he may borrow money. Then the mortgage is limited not only to 80 percent of the total value of the completed structure but also to 100 percent of the structure that is built upon the property.

Does that seem to meet the Senator's objection?

Mr. BAILEY. I am not objecting. I said I am going to vote for the measure, but I wish to know what safeguards there are. That is not a safeguard, to be sure.

I am speaking here in the presence of men who have had banking experience and business experience. I am sure the Senator from Michigan has had such experience. Any lawyer who loaned money on that basis probably would be disbarred. Any bank that loaned money on that basis would be closed by the Comptroller of the Currency. Any individual who loaned money on that basis would be put in the asylum, or have a guardian appointed for him; but our democracy must do it; and I am for it.

That is my position.

Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. ADAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BROWN. I yield first to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, following the answer of the Senator from Michigan to the Senator from North Carolina, not only is the value of the land not considered in determining the amount of the loan, but the land and all the improvements upon it must be free of encumbrance. Otherwise the applicant is not eligible for a loan. But, while the value of the land does not enter into the determination of how much money may be loaned, the mortgage applies not only to the improvements but to the land itself.

Mr. BROWN. There are two limitations: 80 percent of the combined value of the land and buildings, and not to exceed the cost of the bare structure itself, exclusive of all of the sewerage, street improvements, and outside improvements to the land.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is it. So that if the land cost $20,000 and the improvements cost $100,000, provided the 100-percent mortgage on the improvements was no greater than 80 percent of the total value, that amount might be obtained; but the mortgage would be against the whole $120,000 worth of property, assuming that there has been no speculative increase in its value.

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. There could not be any speculative increase in the value of the structure itself, because that is determined; and even if there is a speculative increase in the value of the land, it is not considered in determining how much money may be loaned upon it. If, however, there is any increase in the value of the land, it makes even more sure the value of the property upon which the mortgage is taken.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, there can be no question that the construction of a large apartment-house building on a piece of real estate increases the value of the real estate. The history of the F. H. A. has demonstrated that fact in many instances, particularly that of Colonial Village, Va., where the increase in price per foot was very great, and so ascertained, estimated, and made the basis of a loan by an insurance company, a private corporation that has taken the property out of the F. H. A.

It should be said further, in fairness to the Federal Housing Administration, that the amendment known as section 11, on page 18 of the bill, writes into the law a policy which the F. H. A. themselves adopted some time ago; and we have now made that a part of the statute itself.

Mr. ADAMS and Mr. DANAHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. No; I desire to take the floor when the Senator has concluded.

Mr. BROWN. I promised to yield to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] for a question, and I yield to him at this time if the Senator from Colorado wishes the floor in his own right.

Mr. ADAMS. If the Senator from Michigan controls the floor——

Mr. BROWN. I feel, in courtesy to the Senator from Connecticut, that I should yield to Senators who have asked me to do so before I yield the floor.

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his courtesy; but, since I know the purpose of the Senator from Colorado, I yield to him.

Mr. BROWN. I yield the floor.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, one item arose in the colloquy between the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] as to which I had a somewhat different interpretation of the facts. I assume that the statement of the Senator from Michigan was correct, but I think there is a different interpretation. That is as to the percentage of the loans that have been and may be made upon existing structures.

Personally, I had the initial impression that no loans should be made upon existing structures. In recognition of the careful study of the Senator from Michigan, the Senator from Connecticut, and some others, I have rather submerged and subordinated my judgment on that matter to their studies. I have not changed my mind, but I have subordinated my views. As I get the figures now, however, instead of making the available loans upon existing structures very small, we are providing that hereafter the F. H. A. may loan 25 percent of the unloaned amount.

Mr. BROWN. I thought I stated that very clearly.

Mr. ADAMS. I understood the Senator to say that only about 12 percent had been loaned. I simply am going to try to translate the statement into figures.

Mr. BROWN. I think I am right about that. The total amount that has been so far loaned to refinance existing mortgages is 12 percent. I have a letter here to that effect from Mr. McDonald.

Mr. ADAMS. My recollection of the statement made was that when the F. H. A. commenced loaning, something over 70 percent was loaned upon existing structures, and that that amount had been reduced until they were now loaning about 32 percent.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to read into the RECORD a letter dated April 17, from Stewart McDonald, the Administrator.

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. It reads:

DEAR SENATOR BROWN: Since seeing you the other day I have checked up, and find only 12 percent of F. H. A. mortgages insured were for refinancing existing mortgages on old construction, as distinguished from new homes or new purchases of existing homes.

I then, at the hearing, asked him:

Is this 12 percent in dollars, or in total number of houses?

And he replied, and I noted on the letter:

This is 12 percent in dollars.

Mr. ADAMS. I think the figures can be reconciled. The 12 percent is refinancing of existing mortgages, while the larger amount includes all loans guaranteed which are upon existing structures, whether they are new loans or refinancing. I know that under the figures in the amendment, the gentleman who was at the hearing representing the Federal Housing Administration said there was no difference between the limitation of 35 percent as originally put in and the limitation which we put in of 25 percent; that that would permit loaning, roughly, 35 percent in the aggregate. In other words, 25 percent of the amount to be available will run toward $500,000,000.

I am going along with the Senator, but I do not want the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to get the wrong idea.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Utah agrees with the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. BROWN. I think we ought to define what we are talking about. There are two classes of existing construction loans. One class, which the Senator from Utah and I were talking about, consists of loans on houses which are not the basis of a resale and the construction of a new house.

Mr. ADAMS. What I am getting at is, until the Senator had persuaded me, I was opposed to all loans upon existing structures. In other words, I felt that the purpose of the act was to stimulate employment and new construction. As I say, I am subordinating my own judgment to that of those who have studied the matter; but I have a small amendment on the subject. Under the section as now proposed, which has been discussed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], it is provided—to put it in the inverse way—that up to 100 percent of the cost of the improvements on the ground may be loaned.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interrupt him for the purpose of making that statement yet more emphatic?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. As the amendment is drawn, I may borrow the full amount of my expenditure for a structure, 100 percent, and I am enabled to do that by having the land which I bought valued so high that it lifts the percentage of the money expended to 100 percent.

I desire now to ask the Senator from Colorado a question. I think he has been a banker.

Mr. ADAMS. No; I have not.

Mr. BAILEY. I know the Senator has been a lawyer, and I know he is a very able one. Has not that sort of lending been described in this country, up until the past 2 or 3 years, as a shoestring operation? I borrow on a shoestring on the Government guaranty.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; that is the term employed in the western section of the country.

Mr. BAILEY. It was the same thing that produced the Florida boom. It was the same thing that produced the speculation on the stock exchange. A shoestring operation is an operation without much personal responsibility. The only person responsible in this case is the Government of the United States, meaning those who may have to pay the taxes in the long run. I say "may." I doubt whether they ever will. The Government is now operating without taxes. That is, it is spending $3,300,000,000 which is not reflected in taxes; and that is where we are deceiving ourselves. It is a fool's paradise. It is as a bankrupt living prosperously on borrowed money. I have seen men do it, but I have never known one to escape the consequences. That is the shoestring operation.

The wonder to me is, and I am now assuming the attitude of a promoter and an advertiser, that every shoestring operator who went to wreck in Florida, or into the mountains of western North Carolina, when undiscovered mountain lots were being sold for $500 for a 50-foot front, and every promoter who brought the utilities into the disgrace into which they were brought, and others from the time of the organization of the corporation to induce the American people to speculate in German marks, of which we sometimes hear, are not rushing into this opportunity? Are we not substituting Uncle Sam as the money lender and the easy mark? I will not say from what source that valuable phrase just now came. Are we not substituting Uncle Sam for precisely those victims, whose ruin produced the consequences from which we have been trying to emerge? I believe we come around now to the point where we say that the hair of the dog is good for the bite, provided the hair is obtained from the back of Uncle Sam. I think that is to what we have come.

I am not protesting. It is not to be resisted. When the United States Government went into the business of lending money, every man of ordinary common sense ought to have known that he would have to go the whole way, because this is a democracy. We cannot lend to the railroads without lending to the man with a little home. We cannot lend to the insurance companies without lending to the humble fellow. We cannot lend to the farmer without lending to the worker. We cannot lend to the businessman and not lend to the speculator. This is a democracy, and we have equal protection of the laws and equal rights under the laws.

The only thing for this country to do now is to do what it is doing—go the whole way as rapidly as possible and learn the lesson and start over—and that is what it is going to do.

Mr. KING. Amen.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, what interested me was, as I have stated, that there was a provision in the bill which under certain conditions—and I do not attempt to define the mathematical conditions—would permit a loan of 100 percent of the cost of a structure. It seemed to me that that ought not to be permitted. I know that the members of the subcommittee have no intention that that shall be done; they do not feel that that will result. They feel that the 80-percent clause will protect against that.

I propose to offer an amendment which will merely provide, in line 22 on page 18, that after the word "exceed" the words "90 percent of" shall be inserted, so that it will read:

That such mortgage shall not in any event exceed 90 percent of the amount which the Administrator estimates will be the cost of the completed physical improvements.

If Senators on the subcommittee who have persuaded us about the situation say to us that they would not be in favor of the Government lending over 90 percent of the cost of a structure, it seems to me the wise thing is to write that into the bill. It seems to me it sounds desperately bad to say that if I own a piece of ground and erect a structure on it I can borrow a hundred percent of what goes into the structure, with the exception of the utility costs and street costs. I am offering the amendment. I may say that it was offered in the committee and was defeated by a margin of one vote. A majority of those who heard the matter discussed voted for the amendment. There were two absentee votes cast, very properly, and in good, capable hands, which turned the scale and defeated the amendment.

Mr. KING. It was defeated by proxy.

Mr. ADAMS. The votes were absolutely properly cast. It was merely a case of those of us who were arguing not having a chance to appeal to the absent Senators.

Mr. President, I submit the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 18, line 22, after the word "exceed", it is proposed to insert the words "90 percent of."

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I presume we should take the amendment up when we reach the proper place in the bill for its consideration. There are several other matters to be considered.

Mr. ADAMS. I understand that, but the preceding presiding officer merely said that the question was on the committee amendment, as if they were to be voted on as a whole. This is an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. BROWN. I think we ought to consider the committee amendment, and take this amendment up when we reach the proper point in the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, this matter has been discussed, and this particular paragraph has been discussed, and I think I shall ask to have the amendment disposed of at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Danaher	Hughes	Pepper
Andrews	Davis	Johnson, Calif.	Pittman
Ashurst	Donahey	Johnson, Colo.	Radcliffe
Austin	Downey	King	Reed
Bailey	Ellender	La Follette	Reynolds
Bankhead	Frazier	Lee	Schwartz
Barbour	George	Lodge	Schwellenbach
Barkley	Gerry	Logan	Sheppard
Bilbo	Gibson	Lucas	Slattery
Bone	Gillette	Lundeen	Smathers
Borah	Glass	McCarran	Thomas, Okla.
Bridges	Green	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Guffey	McNary	Tobey
Bulow	Gurney	Maloney	Townsend
Burke	Hale	Mead	Truman
Byrnes	Harrison	Minton	Tydings
Capper	Hatch	Murray	Vandenberg
Caraway	Hayden	Neely	Wagner
Chavez	Herring	Norris	Walsh
Clark, Idaho	Hill	Nye	Wheeler
Clark, Mo.	Holman	O'Mahoney	White
Connally	Holt	Overton	Wiley

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in regard to the Adams amendment. If we are to adhere to the policy of the National Housing Act, that is, 80 percent insured mortgages, we should defeat the Adams amendment. As a matter of fact, the outside limit of the insurance will probably be between 76 percent and 77 percent, because, as appears in the latter part of subsection 2, on page 18, not only must the landowner have his land free and clear of all encumbrances but he must undertake and build the public utilities, the streets; he must undertake the organization expenses and the other miscellaneous charges incidental to the construction. The result of the adoption of the Adams amendment would be practically to cut the loaning power of the F. H. A.—to use that term, and everyone knows what I mean—down to 66 or 67 percent, instead of 77 percent, as is the situation today.

What was the purpose of the F. H. A.? It was to eliminate the evil which existed in the construction industry of having a second and third mortgage in back of a first mortgage. We wanted to bring about such a situation that there would be one mortgage, and that mortgage adequately protected, based upon a careful estimate of the land value. As was apparent from my discussion with the Senator from Utah, every attempt we have made in the bill further to limit the amount the F. H. A. may loan seems to meet with opposition. The Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Utah wish to go further than we did. The bill is a great improvement over the present law. Under the present law, as a matter of absolute legal authority, the F. H. A. could loan 110 or 120 percent on the value of the building, but we cut them down to a mortgage that cannot exceed the value of the building itself, exclusive of all the outside improvements.

Mr. President, what would be the situation in a city such as New York, the city of Indianapolis, or the city of Detroit, where the cost of the land is a very much greater factor than it is in a place such as Colonial Village, in nearby Virginia, where the cost of the land is only a small proportion of the total amount borrowed? I think that in a great many instances in the future the F. H. A. will assist in the construction of apartment houses closer to the centers of cities. Suppose the cost of the land in Providence, R. I., is one-third of the total cost of the structure, and suppose, then, that we are limited to 90 percent of the value of the buildings. We are getting down then pretty close to a 50 percent or 55 percent mortgage. The amendment would have a very crippling effect in the large cities of the country where the evils we seek to remedy by the bill are the greatest.

We have gone a part of the distance. We have cut down considerably the F. H. A.'s authority and power under existing law. I think we have gone far enough.

The bill before us is to a great extent for the benefit of the large cities. I, myself, opposed the amendment in the committee, because I believed that there were many times when the value of the land was a very material factor in the value of the mortgage. Under the bill 20 percent of the value must be in the land. I can readily visualize situations where 35 percent of the value of the property would be in the land as distinguished from the building.

Therefore, I urge upon Senators the defeat of the amendment because of its crippling effect in the larger cities of the country.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I agree with the statement of the Senator from Michigan, and I am afraid that if the amendment were adopted the activities of the F. H. A., which have had so salutary an effect in our larger communities, which have stimulated construction and increased employment to an unexpected extent, would be entirely crippled. One of two things would happen. Either we would go back to the old days before F. H. A. came into the field, when in order to finance such structures it was necessary to put a first, second, and sometimes a third mortgage on the property, which ended in exploitation, scandal, and also in the end arrested construction. Either that would happen or there would be no construction at all.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to give a very conservative illustration of how it might affect construction in the cities. Assume that the land value is $20,000, the buildings are worth $60,000, and the utilities, streets, and improvements to the land other than the buildings are worth $5,000. That would mean the total appraised value or estimated value would be $85,000. Eighty percent of that valuation would be $68,000. However, since we have the limitation——

Mr. BROWN. The Adams amendment?

Mr. WAGNER. No; the committee amendment which is in the bill. Under that amendment we could not lend more than $60,000, because that is the cost of the buildings. So we reduce by $8,000 the amount which would be available under the present law.

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. WAGNER. However, if we should adopt the Adams amendment, the $60,000 mortgage would have to be further reduced to $54,000. Thus we would have a mortgage of only 64 percent of the value of the property.

Mr. BROWN. That condition very well illustrates the argument I made that the situation in the large cities would be such that the mortgages would be from 60 to 65 or 68 percent instead of 80 percent or 77 percent as they now are.

Mr. WAGNER. Which we have discovered is not sufficient to stimulate construction.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, while the Senator from New York is on the floor, may I ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from New York said that if we should adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], which is a very moderate amendment, limiting the loan to 90 percent in place of 100 percent, we should have to go back to the time when people built under first, second, and third mortgages. That was a pretty bad time, was it not?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; and the F. H. A. has so cleaned up that situation and done away with it that banks in New York and other large centers are now lending money at 4¼ percent with the F. H. A. insurance, whereas previously they were charging 6 percent plus bonuses.

Mr. BAILEY. However, the banks are not lending on the property.

Mr. WAGNER. So we have reduced the interest, as the Senator from Michigan has so ably said. One of the desirable effects of the F. H. A. has been to reduce interest rates all over the country from 7, 8, or 9 percent down to a reasonable rate, as low as 4¼ percent in some instances. I very much fear that the amendment would seriously impede or impair activities, particularly in the large cities, so that the construction which we need, both from the standpoint of unemployment and from the standpoint of shortage of dwellings would be curtailed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the banks are not lending money on the property. They are lending money on the guaranty of the Government of the United States. That is the answer. However, that is not the point of my inquiry. The Senator made the remark that we would have to go back to the time when, in many instances, there were first, second, and third mortgages. It was a very bad time. It was a terrible time for those who had the second and third mortgages. They lost. Now it is calmly proposed that Uncle Sam shall take the first, second, and third mortgages. That is the proposal.

That is all I have to say.

Mr. BROWN. I should like the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] for just a moment. In his statement a few minutes ago, the Senator instanced the price of land on the misty mountain tops of North Carolina, some of which was not there, in Florida, and along the Gulf coast. Does not the Senator recognize that we have had a tremendous deflation in real-estate values between that time and the present?

In New York, or in Raleigh, N. C., the city where the Senator lives, 80 percent of the present value of a completed structure, inclusive of the land, is very different from an 80-percent mortgage, or even a 50-percent mortgage in those communities back in the boom days of real estate. In other words, there has been a tremendous reduction in the value of real estate. We are today in a deflated real-estate condition, and, in my judgment, the mortgages referred to are much more safe than were 50- or 60-percent mortgages back in the time to which the Senator from North Carolina refers.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I wish to correct the Senator. I did not say the land in western North Carolina did not exist. I am sure it is there. I do not know what became of those who bought it. Probably they have passed out of the picture; but the land is there. I said the land was undiscovered. It was. People bought the lots and then went to find them, and they could not find them.

As to the deflation of values, we all recognize that values in this country did go up. I think they were what we would call inflated values. That statement applies to stocks as well as to real estate. Why did the values go up? Mainly on account of shoestring operations and irresponsible credit. Everybody got into the speculation. There was a speculative madness at the expense of improvident individuals. We are now proposing a speculative madness at the expense of the American Republic. That is the only difference.

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator that the difference is that today's 80 percent F. H. A. mortgages are based upon deflated values. When loans were made upon properties in Florida, western North Carolina, Michigan, and New York, they were based upon the inflated values of that time. We are now basing our mortgages on a value which, in my judgment, is below the real, natural value of the land. Mortgages were then based upon an inflated value, which was away above the value of today.

Mr. BAILEY. I agree with the Senator that present values are much less than they were in 1927, 1928, and 1929. Of course, it is a little safer to lend money on the lower values than it was to lend it on the higher values. However, we cannot get around the fact that no man, no government can lend 100 percent of the cost of a building without taking the entire risk. One hundred percent means the entire risk. The borrower will receive the money from the American taxpayers. That is where we assume he will get it. However, nobody believes it. That reality never comes home to us. We are simply asking in the Adams amendment that the borrower take the risk to the extent of 10 percent of the cost of the structure. A man who is not willing to do that is not entitled to credit from anybody. The man who will not put up 10 percent would not lend money on that basis. If the Senator from Michigan ever loaned money on that basis, he would be driven out of the bank and probably put in the penitentiary for doing so. Bankers have been put in the penitentiary for doing less. A guardian who ever did such a thing for a ward would be discharged by the court of chancery. Yet we say it is all right.

I am not objecting. That is the democratic way of doing things. That is the democratic money-lending policy. I am not talking about a political party. I am simply saying that when a democracy goes into the money-lending business it must go all the way and lend 100 percent. If next year we are asked to lend 110 percent, we shall have to lend 110 percent; and if we asked to reduce the interest rate to 2 percent, we shall have to do that. We are in a democracy and we are accountable in the elections.

Mr. BROWN. On that point, the Senator knows that repeatedly we have been asked for a rate of 2 or 3 percent on Home Owners' Loan mortgages. We have not granted such requests.

Mr. BAILEY. We came down to 3 percent on agricultural loans.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator fails to point out that in addition to the limitation which we have written into the bill, which he must admit is much better than the present law——

Mr. BAILEY. I agree that we are making some progress.

Mr. BROWN. In addition, we have a practical limitation of 76 or 77 percent. The total mortgage cannot exceed 80 percent of the value of the entire property when completed, from which must be deducted the 3 or 4 percent represented by the cost of sewerage, water, and the other public-utility improvements.

Mr. BAILEY. The value of the entire property includes the estimated value of the property due to the improvements put on by the money of the Government. That fact opens the door and lets us go just as far as we please. Again——

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish my sentence. Again I am saying that a few years later, when we are asked to reduce the interest rate, we cannot resist that request; and if we do it for one we must do it for all. I am making the point that when a representative democracy such as this goes into the money-lending business, we shall find ourselves absolutely unable to resist the demands made upon us. We must go the whole length.

I now yield to the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. I was going to ask the Senator whether or not it is his view that there ought to be a rigid rule applied to every lending institution in the country which lends money upon mortgages, that, irrespective of the value of the land, the loan can never exceed 90 percent of the value of the improvements less the cost of the improvements which have been mentioned, such as lighting and other matters.

Mr. BAILEY. Not only would I say that but I will speak from personal experience for a moment. I was once on the investment committee of a savings bank. I never saw the hour when I dared violate my trust as a director and lend to anybody without personal responsibility and safe collateral. The present proposal is to lend 90 percent of the cost of a structure and then increase the value of the land by reason of the improvement, so that the effect is a loan of 100 percent on the value of the structure. No banker in America can do it. No building and loan association can do it. No guardian can do it. No insurance company can do it, but Uncle Sam can do it, because this is a democracy and we have to do what the people ask us to do.

Mr. BROWN. Uncle Sam's record in that respect, I will say to the Senator, is very good. On loans under title I, the small house and modernization title, which the F. H. A. has itself felt that we ought not continue but which the public thinks we should continue, the loss to date on the loans made last year—and of course, it will be a little greater hereafter, for it must be remembered that the loans under title I are for an average of 33 months—has been six one-hundredths of 1 percent, which is almost infinitesimal.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that statement calls for one more remark. The Senator is flattering himself that up to now we have lost very little money. Let me remind the Senator that we have just begun. I will make a prediction. We are at present in a depression. Every chart in America is pointing downward; every commodity price is going downward; the income of the Government is going down and going down very fast, despite the highest taxes ever levied in this country as a consequence of the present depression, which we are modifying and ameliorating by fictitious operations in the way of money lending and money borrowing.

When this depression culminates, I predict that Uncle Sam will find amongst his greatest losses the losses from these guaranteed loans. The value of these properties will go down. I am speaking from memory, but the last time I read the statistics regarding the operations of the H. O. L. C. the United States Government had already been forced to foreclose 200,000 different properties. Well, that is just the beginning. We are in an artificial situation; we have boosted ourselves up by the distribution of $3,300,000,000 more per year than we have collected. That is the average for the last 6 years, and the total for 6 years is $20,000,000,000. Our deficit this year is already in the neighborhood of $3,000,000,000, and everyone agrees that it will reach three and a half billion dollars; and it will be the ninth deficit in a row.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield in a moment. Senators who think that we are getting along all right are merely deluded by their own self-deception. This country is not getting along all right; it is headed for the rocks just so surely as any bankrupt ever was so headed who deceives himself by borrowing money. The case of the United States today is nothing but the case of a badly embarrassed man who fools himself by going around and getting hold of $10,000 from somebody and having a big party and pretending that he is well off. The country is in the most wretched condition.

Take cotton. The cotton situation in the whole history of the country was never so bad as it is today. Cotton is selling today for less than it was when the first A. A. A. bill was passed. Do not forget that. And wheat is, too, and corn is, too. Yet we hear talk of prosperity.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I am anxious to ascertain the Senator's attitude. Does the Senator feel that the Government should not have made any of the loans which it has made to the agricultural industry, to the cotton growers, the wheat growers, the tobacco growers and others, but that it should have just let things go; or was that a different case?

Mr. BAILEY. I think there was a time when a certain amount of emergency lending was necessary. That recalls to my mind a very interesting hour here in the United States Senate. In the spring of 1932, when all of us felt that we were on the edge of the precipice or standing on the edge in the hole of the bottom of the depression, President Hoover called upon Congress to erect the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That was for the purpose of lending money to the railroads, to banking institutions, and to building and loan associations. My friend here says "also to insurance companies," but insurance companies did not borrow. The argument was that unless we protected the price of the bonds of the railroads, the insurance companies, having a great many of those bonds, would suffer. That is the extent that the insurance companies were involved.

I debated that in my mind at that time. I am answering the question of the Senator from New York. I was extremely reluctant to vote for that legislation. There were then here Senators who have great reputations now for being liberal, one of whom has been promoted to the highest position in the Government short of one or two, who said they could not vote for a measure so radical as that, and I was accused of radicalism and liberalism because I said that in that great emergency I was willing that my Government should extend such aid as might be necessary to save this Republic from collapse. I said at the same time that I knew it was setting a precedent that would give me trouble the remainder of my course in the United States Senate, but I also said that when the time should come to resist demands based upon that precedent, and to get out of the emergency and to go back to private self-reliance and private enterprise I hoped that I would be the man to have the courage to do that. So I have resisted the tide, to some extent, since.

I think we should make a very great distinction between the extraordinary efforts of the Government to save its people in an intense emergency from callapse and the duty of the Government to abandon the emergency methods and go back to self-reliance and private enterprise. At the rate we are going, we are turning the Government over to every borrower and every beggar. I do not think we can stop loans, and I am not resisting. I simply say that what we did in the name of emergency ought not to become the fixed policy.

Mr. President, you were not in the Senate at that time, but other Senators will bear me out in the statement I am about to make. The Senator who sat in the seat where the majority leader now sits—and I honor his memory—was the Democratic leader—that Democratic leader said to me in the cloakroom, "BAILEY, I hope you can find your way to vote for this measure.' It had come from President Hoover and many Democrats were against it. I said, "I do not see it very easily; it is very difficult." He said, "I am informed that unless this measure passes by 12 o'clock tonight"—and it will be remembered how earnestly we labored to pass it by midnight that night; we sat long in a night session—"unless we pass it by 12 o'clock tonight, 500 banks will close in New York State tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock." I have never before told that. It can be told now, because the danger has passed. I will say to the Senator from New York that if that were the situation now, if there were a great emergency like that, and my vote for anything would save this country from collapse, there is no telling how far I would go, nor how severely I would be rebuked for my radicalism by men who would subsequently be promoted for being "liberals."

I do not regret my action, under all the circumstances, but I do deeply regret that the emergency argument is used now and the Congress does not seem to have the capacity to resist the demands for more and more and more and more, until at this moment we are all witnesses to the fact that the Congress has gone beyond the President's Budget, and, while our revenue for the year is not likely to be more than five and a half billion dollars, the appropriations of the present session of Congress at this moment threaten to reach the point of $11,000,000,000 and are certain to reach the point of $10,500,000,000. That means, Mr. President, that we have lost all sense of restraint; that means, Mr. President, that we have lost all sense of perspective; that means, Mr. President, that we are yielding and yielding and yielding and are unwilling to face the inevitable consequence that at the end of the road, not far off, is national bankruptcy. That in itself is not half so bad, not half so much to be resisted and abhorred, as the ruin which will be visited upon millions of innocent Americans who have trusted us with their fate, with their welfare, and with their rights. That, Mr. President, is all I have to say.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I thought there were some measures which this administration had enacted of which there was almost universal approval; for example, the C. C. C. and the R. F. C. I thought the F. H. A. surely would fall in that category, because it afforded public aid in furtherance of private effort. I thought all of us agreed that it was a laudable objective to aid the people of the United States to have better homes; and I thought everyone was happy about the fact that in the Federal Housing Administration the Government was merely stimulating, assisting, and encouraging private enterprise.

We have now had enough experience with this act to see what its effects have been. That experience indicates that at the present time there are over one and a quarter billion dollars of F. H. A. mortgage insurance in effect and in force in this country, and that the total losses which have been sustained by the Federal Housing Administration in the entire period of its existence amount to only $160,708, or one one-hundredth of 1 percent of the amount insured; and to take care of that meager loss there is a reserve fund of $24,000,000, contributed not by the Government but by the persons who were the beneficiaries of the insurance plan, as a reserve against losses which might occur. The reserve fund is $24,000,000 and the total losses are only $160,000.

Mr. President, if that has not been a success, it seems to me it would be difficult to point out an agency which has had a successful operation.

I knew it was not necessary that those facts be reiterated, because the able junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] has already presented them, if not literally, in substance. I merely want to add that there has been a difference of opinion among Members of Congress as to the way in which the Government may contribute most reasonably, properly, and helpfully to recovery in this country.

There are some of us who are even willing to put into effect a program of public works of large enough scope to give employment to every employable man and woman in the country, and think that would be a desirable objective for the Nation to pursue, and I hope at some time we may yet come to it. But I surely cannot understand the argument of anybody who would want to retard the progress and the development of home building in this country by an agency which has had such a successful experience as has the Federal Housing Administration. I believe that if the R. F. C. and the Federal Housing Administration were even to liberalize their activities, the good they would do in the increase of the national income and the enlargement of the national assets would far outweigh and overbalance any relatively small losses which an expansion of their plans might possibly involve.

So instead of diminishing the powers and the facilities for aid which may be rendered by an agency like this, which acts through private enterprise, why can we not enlarge their scope, so that we may perhaps reduce the amount of money we spend for W. P. A. and public-works programs which do not go through the channels of private enterprise?

I think if the R. F. C. were liberalized in operation, and their losses, now negligible, were increased a small amount only, and even if the F. H. A. had small losses—they have not had any losses so far, taking into consideration their reserve—the aid that this program would give through private enterprise to the country, not to speak of the assets that the country would enjoy in having millions of its citizens in better homes, would be so salutary that it seems to me it would commend itself to the membership of the Congress.

So, if, in the past, we have insured loans not to exceed 90 percent of the value of the security offered in the case of small loans, and up to 80 percent in the case of larger loans, and if we have not had any losses under that liberal plan, why should we at this time, with that salutary record and favorable experience behind us, want to hamstring this useful agency by more restrictions? Hence, I hope, in the interest of a sound recovery, this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I shall have to leave the Chamber in a few minutes. I wish to inquire of the Senator who has charge of the bill whether anything contained in the bill will prevent the write-ups that are being made on some of the properties on which money is being loaned.

Mr. BROWN. That is the precise subject we are discussing.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say that the fact has been called to my attention that at present an individual may buy a piece of property, say, for $10,000, and turn it over to a corporation which will write up its value to $100,000, and the corporation perhaps will turn it over to somebody else and have still another write-up—the very thing we have often condemned upon the floor of the Senate in connection with other matters. Anybody who has had anything to do with opposing the practices of public utilities knows that the one thing we oppose above all others is the write-ups which take place among the utilities and railroads and all the other industries which are subject to the supervision of regulatory bodies. Now we find, as a matter of fact, that the Government is permitting that sort of thing to be done with the loans it is making to speculators. That is what is happening, as a matter of fact, in some instances. A speculator buys a piece of property for a small sum, and then writes up its value in some instances, I am told, as much as 10 times what he bought it for, and then obtains a Government loan on it.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator does not mean that that has happened in the F. H. A.

Mr. WHEELER. That is exactly what I mean. It has happened in the F. H. A.

Mr. BROWN. I really do not think that is a fact.

Mr. WHEELER. I happen to know that it is a fact. There is not any question about it. I have talked to some of the authorities in the F. H. A., and called their attention to it, and they admitted that it had been done and was being done in several instances to which I specifically called their attention. I do not want to go into specific cases, but I happen to know of specific instances in which that has been done. Let me say to the Senator, if he has any question about it, that if he will ask the head of the F. H. A., he will tell the Senator that that has been done.

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator from Montana that as I recall the testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee, the most extreme case we had was the so-called St. Louis, Mo., case, which gave rise to the Cochran amendment, as I understand.

Mr. WHEELER. That is not the only case of the kind.

Mr. BROWN. I understand that the write-up in that instance was by no means what the Senator says—10 times the original value of the property.

Mr. WHEELER. Perhaps it was an exaggeration to say "10 times"; but let me say to the Senator that what I have described happened not only in that one particular case but in other cases, because I called the attention of the F. H. A. officials to some other cases, and they admitted that it was done. In how many cases it has been done, I do not know; but I know that in two or three instances, to which I called the attention of the F. H. A. authorities, it did take place.

Mr. BROWN. We may differ as to the facts, but the amendment provides that no mortgage may exceed in amount the value of the building which is constructed upon the real estate. Also, it may not exceed 80 percent of the total value of the land and the building. The evil which the Senator sees and refers to is overcome by the committee amendment to the bill.

Mr. WHEELER. What is the amendment?

Mr. BROWN. It provides that in no instance may the amount of the mortgage exceed the estimated cost of the buildings constructed upon the property, which I think would prevent any such thing as has been mentioned by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Why should there not be a further limitation? Instead of saying that we will loan the full cost of the building, why should not the loan be limited to a certain percentage of the cost of the building? Of course, I appreciate that there is an argument on the other side, and that when a piece of property is bought, and a building is constructed on it, the ground itself may become more valuable because of the fact that the building is constructed on it.

Mr. BROWN. That point is overcome by the amendment. The value of the land itself is one limitation. The second limitation, which we have written in, is the value of the improvements.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Michigan knows, as a matter of fact, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and other Senators who have investigated utility operations know, that when we went into that subject before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and when we went into some of the railroad operations, the one thing that we harped on and denounced above all others was the write-ups by the utilities. They have always come in and said, "When we bought the property for $10,000 and wrote it up to $100,000, or when we bought it for $100,000 and wrote it up to several million dollars, that was perfectly justified because of the fact that after we bought the property we made improvements to it." I say to the Senator from Michigan that if that sort of thing is permitted by a Government agency like the F. H. A., the Senator cannot ever stand on the floor of the Senate after that and criticize utilities for doing the very thing we permit this agency to do.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator realizes that this amendment prevents anything of that kind.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not sure that it does. What we are doing is simply saying that the Government is going to loan the full value of the building. I do not think it should be done. I do not think I ought to be able, as a private citizen, to go to the Government and say, "Here is a building that is going to cost $100,000," and borrow the whole $100,000 from the Government. I do not believe it is justified, I do not think it is right, and I do not think we can sustain that kind of a proposal.

I am perfectly willing to have the Government make loans upon real estate; but I do not believe it is right to have our Government loan to real-estate fakers or promoters $100,000 on a building which is to cost $100,000. When that is being done, the little fellow is not being helped at all. It is a lot of real-estate promoters who are being helped. The little home owner is not being helped, but a lot of fake real-estate promoters are being helped. That is what has been going on with the F. H. A. There is no one here who can say that that is not true.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator grossly exaggerates.

Mr. WHEELER. No; I am not exaggerating.

Mr. BROWN. He exaggerates when he states that the F. H. A. was created and is being operated for the benefit of real-estate fakers. I do not think the Senator means that. Ninety percent of the F. H. A. guaranties does not in any way relate to the large apartment house construction. Only 10 percent is applicable to that. I deny that that 10 percent has gone to people whom the Senator can characterize as "real-estate fakers." Consider the situation in Colonial Village, Va., which was criticized by some. Yet that development has been taken over by a private insurance corporation on a much more favorable basis than that granted by the Federal Housing Administration.

Mr. WHEELER. Very well. I say that there have been promotion schemes, and I repeat, there have been promotion schemes by real-estate promoters and real-estate fakers for the very purpose I have designated on this floor. How many of them there are I do not know. But we should not permit it in our legislation, whether it is 10 percent, or 1 percent——

Mr. BROWN. Or 30 percent.

Mr. WHEELER. Or 30 percent, or whatever it is.

Mr. BROWN. It is just a question of where we are to draw the line. Some say it should be 90 percent. We say a hundred percent. The Senator's argument would lead us to such a situation that it would not be in excess of 50 percent.

Mr. WHEELER. It ought to be more than 50 percent, but I do not think it ought to be a hundred percent. As a matter of fact, I do not think it ought to be over 80 percent. I cannot see any reason in the world why, if I wish to erect an apartment house, I should be able to go to the Government and borrow more than 80 percent of the value of the apartment I am building.

Mr. BROWN. Of course, the Senator means guarantee.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; to guarantee more than 80 percent. I do not think it is the right thing for the Government to do that.

Mr. BROWN. In addition to that, we have a limitation of 80 percent of the total value of the completed project.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes. I think it should not be more than 80 percent of the property actually being erected. I think, if that is provided, we are being very generous to the apartment-house builders and the real-estate promoters.

Mr. BROWN. I again say to the Senator that in the Committee on Banking and Currency we have made an effort to correct the situation to which the Senator has referred. This measure is a great improvement over existing law. I think the Senator ought to give us some credit for that.

Mr. WHEELER. I am glad to hear that some of the evils which have been going on are to be corrected.

Mr. BROWN. We think we have gone as far as we should in that respect. If the Adams amendment is adopted, we will have such a situation in the larger cities of the country—New York, Detroit, Chicago, and such places—that the mortgages may be 60-percent mortgages or 55-percent mortgages.

Many years ago, in the National Housing Act, we adopted an 80-percent policy in connection with projects of the kind we are discussing, and that has been the law up to the present time. We now impose a further limitation, so that the amount of the mortgage cannot exceed the value of the bare improvement itself, exclusive of water, exclusive of all the public utilities that are necessary to be brought in, and exclusive of the value of the land itself.

The Senator will admit that, in building an apartment house, let us say, somewhat close to Central Park, in the city of New York, the value of the land might conceivably be 50 percent of the total value of the whole structure. Those proposing to build such an apartment, who are entitled to some consideration, could not possibly come within the limitations of the pending measure if we adopted the Adams amendment.

Mr. WHEELER. After all, the Senator is speaking of an apartment house being built in the city of New York, or an apartment house being built in the city of Chicago, or in some other city. Should the Government of the United States, as a matter of fact, guarantee loans for that sort of thing?

Mr. BROWN. The Senator should remember that only 10 percent of the money goes in that way. Ninety percent of it is used otherwise.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not care whether it is 10 percent or what it is; I question the wisdom of the Government of the United States making that kind of loans at all. If it is to make that kind of loans, then I think that we should put a pretty strict regulation on it.

Mr. BROWN. We do.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think that has been done in the past. It is not helping the little fellow. I have been one of those who have gone along with the making of loans to home owners, for the building of homes, and that sort of thing, but I do not wish to go along in just helping those who are promoting apartment-house projects in the cities. That is not of any benefit to the little fellow; it is not of any benefit to the worker.

Mr. BROWN. Does the Senator think it is of no benefit to the little fellow if the man who is unable to build a home, even a $2,500 home, as is provided for in this measure, could, as a taxpayer and a citizen of the United States, have the advantage of the lower rentals he would have to pay in these limited-dividend apartment houses?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think he gets any such advantage. As a matter of fact, I do not think that in many of the instances the home owners are getting any benefit from the erection of more apartment houses in the big cities. I do not think that is helping the little home owner or the man who has to pay rent.

Mr. BROWN. I differ with the Senator. I think it does benefit the little home owner.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not agree with the Senator with reference to that.

I was interested in what the Senator from North Carolina stated about loans to the R. F. C. I happen to be one of those who stood on the floor of the Senate when the R. F. C. bill was before us and spoke against it and voted against it. I never have regretted that I was one of the few who voted against it.

I stated then that when we started making loans to railroads and started making loans to banks we could not resist making loans to everyone who came asking for loans out of the Public Treasury. I stated then that we should let the banks and insurance companies and the railroads which could not stand up go into the hands of receivers. If we had done that at that time, in my judgment we would have been on the upward road. But beginning with the Hoover administration, with the depression, we have sought to maintain the debt structures of the private industries of this country, and the railroads today are no better off. The Senator from Connecticut stood on the floor of the Senate and stated, "If you pass this bill, the smoke will be coming out of the chimneys, and this is going to bring prosperity." In the Committee on Interstate Commerce we are considering legislation at this time dealing with the railroad problem, and the testimony before the committee is that one-third of the railroads are in bankruptcy and another third on the verge of bankruptcy, notwithstanding the fact that the Government of the United States has poured out millions on millions of dollars to save them from bankruptcy; and we are still in identically the same condition in which we previously were.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator knows that I am what might be called something of a "middle-of-the-roader." I agree with much the Senator from Montana says, and with some of the things the Senator from North Carolina has said. But both Senators are attacking a bill which, in my judgment, is the least of our sins in this respect.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not attacking the bill.

Mr. BROWN. The Federal Housing Administration has done a good job. They have not put their hands into the Treasury of the United States and taken out anything to lend to people. By assuming some of the risk they are merely encouraging banks and other financial institutions throughout the United States to make the loans.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me call the Senator's attention to a misinterpretation. I am not one of those who are attacking the bill. I am merely saying, with reference to loans to the people who are building apartment houses, or guaranteeing the loans, that we should not go to the extent the Senator from Michigan thinks we should go. I am criticizing the Federal Housing Administration because they let fellows make write-ups, and then take them into consideration when they guarantee the loans.

Mr. BROWN. I think those cases have been very small and inconsequential.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, just one word. There are some members on the floor now who were not present when this matter first came up.

The amendment of the committee provides that the Federal Housing Administration may guarantee a loan of 80 percent of the completed value of a property, which includes the write-up of the land. To get to the point of the Senator from Montana, I know of a particular instance not a thousand miles from here of a large apartment house being built on land purchased for about a thousand dollars an acre, which was written up to over $10,000 an acre. There were 40 or 50 acres. In other words, there was a write-up of from $400,000 to $500,000.

The amendment which the committee submits contains a provision which, stated in the inverse way, is that the administration may lend 100 percent of the cost of the improvements on the ground, providing they do not exceed 80 percent of the total cost, including the write-up. In other words, if I own a piece of vacant property, my own property, I can come in and, under some conditions, borrow 100 percent of the cost of the structure I put on it.

The amendment I have offered provides that the F. H. A. may not guarantee a loan of over 90 percent, on the theory that the owner of the property ought to be willing to put into the cost at least 10 percent of his own money.

It does not seem to me to be a great demand on the part of the Government. If the 80-percent provision will not permit loaning 100 percent or 90 percent, the 90-percent provision will not in any way impair the function. In the amendment we are not dealing with the building of homes. We are dealing with what the Senator from Michigan says represents perhaps 10 percent of the activities in dollars. That is approximately correct, is it not?

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. We are dealing with the large enterprises, the speculative enterprises, the building of great apartment houses, which, as we have seen in this neighborhood, perhaps contain 1,200, 1,300, or 1,400 apartments, built for speculative purposes and not for the purpose of homes of the owners.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. LEE. Am I to understand, then, that the provision of the committee amendment would not allow a prospective home owner to borrow 100 percent on the construction of his home? As the committee amendment stands now, could the home owner borrow only 90 percent?

Mr. ADAMS. The home owner is dealt with in a different section.

Mr. BROWN. He can borrow 90 percent of the total value,

Mr. ADAMS. The amendment applies only to the 10 percent to which the Senator from Michigan referred.

Mr. BROWN. Yes; the large apartment-house construction.

Mr. LEE. And the builder can borrow 100 percent of the value of the structure.

Mr. BROWN. On a multiple dwelling or large apartment house.

Mr. ADAMS. The section of the original act which it is proposed to amend contains this sentence at the end, which does not seem to be included in the language as it comes from the committee:

> No mortgage shall be accepted for insurance under this section or section 210 unless the Administrator finds that the property or project, with respect to which the mortgage is executed, is economically sound.

That requirement seems to have been eliminated. It may be in some other place, but it is not in this section.

Mr. BROWN. I may say to the Senator that what he says appears at first glance from reading the bill to be a fact, but it is not a fact, because the sentence the Senator read is in existing law, which is not changed.

Mr. ADAMS. The section is rewritten. The bill provides that the first sentence of section 207, as amended, is amended to read as follows——

Mr. BROWN. The second and third sentences in the section are not amended or changed in any way.

Mr. ADAMS. I refer to subdivision (c) in section 11.

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator that section 11 amends the first sentence of section 207 (c), but it does not in any way change the second or third sentences, which remain in the law as it now is.

Mr. ADAMS. I think that is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to know how the committee amendment changes the existing law.

Mr. ADAMS. The existing law provides that—

> To be eligible for insurance under this section, a mortgage on any property or project shall involve a principal obligation in an amount not to exceed $5,000,000 and not to exceed 80 percent of the amount which the Administrator estimates will be the value of the property or project when the proposed improvements are completed, and such part thereof as may be attributable to dwelling use shall not exceed $1,350 per room.

The section which we are seeking to amend was added on the theory, perhaps, of constituting a limitation.

The following proviso appears in paragraph (2) of section II of the amendment:

> Provided, That such mortgage shall not in any event exceed the amount which the Administrator estimates will be the cost of the completed physical improvements on the property or project * * *.

It seems to authorize a 100-percent loan under the guise of a limitation. The implication is that if we say, "You cannot loan more than 100 percent," that you can loan up to 100 percent, if it comes within the 80-percent limitation as to completed value together with the land.

Mr. LUCAS. How long have we been operating under that provision?

Mr. ADAMS. I think in the neighborhood of 2 years.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. How long have we been operating under that provision?

Mr. BROWN. Which provision?

Mr. LUCAS. The existing law.

Mr. BROWN. Five years.

Mr. LUCAS. What is the theory back of the change?

Mr. BROWN. The theory back of the change is that we wanted to prevent a loan in an amount greater than the value of the structure itself, exclusive of the land or public utility improvements to the land, such as electricity, gas, sewerage, water, streets. As the Senator, I think, is seeking to find, this is a further limitation that is not in existing law and prevents any write-up of the land value to permit a mortgage in excess of the cost of the structure.

Mr. LUCAS. That was a regulation heretofore.

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. Then, if I understand correctly, it is the Senator's opinion that the amendment reported by the committee strengthens the basic law and does not take anything from it?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; it is considerably strengthened.

Mr. ADAMS. The limitation does not go far enough. The limitation limits the loan to the cost of the improvements.

Mr. BROWN. But it is an improvement over existing law.

Mr. ADAMS. Yes, indeed; I think it is an improvement over existing law.

Mr. LUCAS. And the Senator's amendment, as I understand, would extend the limitation.

Mr. ADAMS. It would extend the limitation, so that if I owned property I could not have my borrowings guaranteed to exceed 90 percent, rather than the 100 percent which the measure would permit.

While at the present time we have been guaranteeing loans on new structures under prosperous conditions, they run over a long period of time. Those of us at least with experience in smaller communities know that there is a depreciation in values as the years run on, and it is my sincere judgment that even under the provision which I am seeking to insert, the Government by its guaranty will lose from 10 to 20 percent of the amount which it guarantees. In other words, I think we are in for a loss running into the hundreds of millions of dollars. I am willing to go quite a long way, but I am anxious to put some limit on the loans.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator realizes that this is an amortized loan; that as payments are made through the years upon the loan the principal is gradually reduced, and therefore the risk becomes less and less, and the security becomes what bankers call a more seasoned security, after several years of the total period have run than it previously was.

Mr. ADAMS. Unfortunately, the security becomes less and less also, and sometimes the shrinking of the security proceeds more rapidly than the amortization of the loan. I am perfectly willing to see the Government stimulate construction and take some loss, but I think, as the committee reported, the loss is going to be something more than the Government ought to be asked to carry, and that the individual should be asked to put in a part of the cost of his speculative structure.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to ask the Senator a question. In the last Congress we amended the Housing Act so as to make possible the guaranty up to 90 percent instead of 80 percent which had previously been the law.

Mr. BROWN. On the $6,000 houses.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, that is true. As this measure is brought in it permits a 100-percent loan on the value of the improvements put on the property, and in assessing the value of the property on which the loan can be obtained, the lot is not taken into consideration, but is taken into consideration and included in the mortgage.

If the Senator's amendment limiting the loan to 90 percent of the improvements instead of 100 percent should be agreed to, would it not be possible that we would not only reduce the total amount of the loan available from 90 percent to 80 percent, but even in some cases below 80 percent, which was always the maximum provided in the law originally upon which a loan might be obtained? Would not that in many cases result?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, we are doing one thing fundamentally, as the Senator from Michigan has said. We are reducing interest rates. We are helping the borrower get lower interest rates by the guaranty. We are raising the percent on the loan which may be guaranteed up to 80 percent. In the past history of the United States generally 80-percent mortgages have proven to be unsound. I venture to say that 90 percent of the 80-percent mortgages have been confronted with defaults. So when we go up to 80 percent we are up in the danger line, and we are materially reducing the interest rates. So it seems to me that we are going too far. I will say to the leader that we ought not to permit a man to borrow the whole cost of his improvements and not carry a little more of the loan, especially in the case of large projects where the investment is speculative for the purpose of profit and not for the purpose of providing the investor with a home.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would agree with the Senator from Colorado if the basis upon which the amount of money to be loaned is founded should include the value of the lot itself upon which there may be a speculative increase. We are avoiding that result by providing that in fixing the amount to be loaned the original property, unimproved, shall not be considered at all.

Mr. ADAMS. There are two phases of this paragraph. The first is that the loan may not exceed 80 percent of the value of the property when it is completed, including the value of the real estate with such improvements as may be made by the structure. There is an 80-percent limitation. It is also provided that in no event shall the loan be more than 100 percent of the cost of the improvements. What I am picturing is an instance in which acreage property of little value is bought, and then, for all practical purposes, the owner borrows the full cost both of the lots and of the improvements.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] naturally thinks in terms of high city values. Having been a country boy, I cannot help thinking in terms of the wider places, where real-estate values are lower. I think it is thoroughly unfair to the Government to apply the situation described to land of lower value, such as suburban land.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator is now imposing a limitation which will affect properties in the larger communities, where the land values are higher, as well as in the communities to which he refers, where land values are lower.

Mr. ADAMS. If I may interrupt the Senator for a moment, I look upon myself as a sort of attorney for the United States. That is my job. I say that if there is one situation which is all right, and another which is all wrong, those who come in to make the loans ought to correct the situation which is wrong. Instead of doing good at the expense of another, let the amendment be written so as to protect the city situation, and not outrage the Government in the other places.

Mr. WAGNER. In the area to which the Senator refers, there may very well be many situations in which the land would represent less than 20 percent of the value of the land and the building. However, in the larger communities such as New York, Chicago, and other cities, there is rarely a case in which the value of the land is less than 20 percent of the value of the entire project; and in those cases the Senator makes an absolutely rigid rule that a builder can never obtain a loan higher than 60 or 65 percent.

The Senator would discriminate against the builders in large cities. I think the law ought to be universally fair. We ought not to discriminate. The proposed limitation is a discrimination against the sound builders in large communities. I will say to the Senator that some very large projects have been completed under F. H. A. loans. They are sound projects. I do not agree with the prediction which the Senator made, that 80-percent loans are so dangerous that at some time or other the Government will lose a tremendous sum of money. I think such loans on an amortized basis are very sound. They are safer than the old loans under first, second, and third mortgages, when it was possible to borrow up to 90 or 95 percent of the value.

I think there is another danger. Under section 210 a builder may engage in building a large number of small houses which he will afterward sell individually to the workers who can buy $5,000 or $6,000 homes. If this limitation is placed upon the builder who builds 20 or 30 of such houses, he may never be able to build them; and to that extent we shall be depriving the small-home owner, whom we all want to help and have helped under the act, of the opportunity to buy a house, which otherwise he could not purchase.

The experience in other countries which have adopted the system of 80- and 90-percent loans has been very favorable. In England, which I myself had a chance to visit, the 90-percent loan for the small-home owner has been developed, and the experience is extraordinary. There are no losses at all to the Government. The Government does not merely guarantee loans. It actually makes the loans, and the experience has been most favorable.

Speaking of the small-home owner who buys a house for $6,000 or less, we have actually insured more than $878,000,000 worth of such new houses. I am afraid the amendment——

Mr. ADAMS. Such houses are not involved in the amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. They may be. If a builder, under section 210, builds a number of houses as one project, and then divides them and sells them, they will be affected. If a builder cannot obtain a loan on an 80-percent basis, he will not undertake the building of such houses. That is the only way in which the small-home owner in the larger communities can purchase a house. Only very rarely does a worker himself build such a house. He buys from one who has undertaken to build 20 or 30 or 40 homes, and afterward the homes are individually sold to the workers. We are likely to cripple that enterprise.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the Senator allow me to resume for just a moment, to answer him? I do not mean to take him off his feet.

Mr. WAGNER. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. There is a provision for partial releases. Assuming that there is a project for the building of small houses, the individual house may be released from the general mortgage, and the home owner may borrow 90 percent. We are not in any way impairing the right to a 90-percent loan on the part of the home owner, even though his house is built for him by some large contractor.

Mr. WAGNER. In New York and other communities the larger builders erect 30 or 40 houses at a time, because it is more efficient for them to build in that manner. Some of them are beautiful homes. The builder must obtain a loan. Under the restrictive amendment of the Senator, I am afraid he could not obtain a loan greater than 60 percent of the value of the enterprise. Therefore, he would not undertake it, and the small-home owner could not buy his house afterward. That is what I am afraid of. I am really concerned.

Mr. BROWN. The builder builds the homes with the idea of selling them to individual home owners, to persons who are attempting to obtain a little better structure in which to live.

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly. The home owner afterward obtains a 90-percent loan. However, in our larger municipalities the enterprise must be begun as a large undertaking. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado would absolutely cripple such activities. Otherwise I should not resist the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am very sympathetic toward contractors in New York and elsewhere who feel that they ought not to be asked to put up 20 percent of the investment. However——

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think that is an accurate statement. May I correct the Senator? The Senator says the builder should put up 20 percent of the investment. That theory assumes that the land in the larger cities represents less than 15 percent of the value of the entire project.

Mr. ADAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. WAGNER. I cannot think of a case in New York City in which the real value of the land is less than 20 to 30 percent of the value of the entire project.

Mr. ADAMS. Under the very paragraph we are considering the builder could insure up to 80 percent. There is no limitation on the land with its increased value by reason of the improvements. He can now insure up to 80 percent. I am not complaining about that. I think I know what the consequences will be; but I think the builder in New York should be willing to put up 20 percent of the investment, and I do not think he ought to be permitted to borrow the whole cost of the structure which he puts on the ground.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the Senator realizes, of course, that there are also write-downs as well as write-ups. The statute requires that the Federal Housing Administrator shall value the land. All we are doing is permitting the F. H. A. to make a valuation on the land involved. So far as I can see, that valuation has been an honest valuation throughout this entire administration.

Mr. ADAMS. I am not complaining. I have just one thing to say over again. I do not believe that a man who builds a house should have a loan granted by the Government for every dollar put into the improvements.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, we have talked about speculative builders. I wonder if Senators are aware of the fact that the Administrator, by administrative regulation, has provided that not until the loans are paid shall the builder have the right to draw more than 6-percent dividends from the property. Therefore the enterprise cannot be speculative enough to offer the usual profits of speculative building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] to the committee amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which I understand is on the desk.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us first dispose of the pending amendment.

Mr. KING. I will withhold the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I had hoped that we might dispose of the bill promptly so as to have laid before the Senate an important message from the President.

Mr. KING. There will be some further debate. Let us have the message of the President.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think there is any other controversial matter in the bill. I should like to have the committee amendment submitted, and if there is further debate, I am agreeable to postponing it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 5324) was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend certain sections of the National Housing Act."

Mr. WAGNER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer (Mr. MEAD in the chair) appointed Mr. WAGNER, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. DANAHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

STREAM-POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 78, Senate bill 685, the so-called stream-pollution bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the bill by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 685) to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND WORK RELIEF (H. DOC. NO. 270)

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Six years ago this Nation was confronted with a situation calling for rapid and decisive action. Millions of workers were already jobless; their number was increasing, and the economic structure was threatened with collapse. In this crisis the vast reserves of the Federal Government were promptly made available, and emergency assistance was provided for all classes of the population who were in distress.

Since that time we have moved along a broad front to make permanent provision to meet various phases of the problem of unemployment and need. The Social Security Act provides aid for the aged, the blind, and for dependent children. Unemployment compensation, intended to tide workers over from one job to another, furnishes protection against short-term unemployment of the intermittent variety. Public works have employed many persons.

But there has been, and still is, a vast number of unemployed workers for whom some other protection must be provided.

It is very important to remember that the fundamental decision which was made in connection with the problem of providing for the needy able-bodied unemployed was whether provision should be made through the medium of work or a dole. I have on numerous occasions expressed my conviction that the proper solution was work, but I desire to take this opportunity to reaffirm my conviction in that regard.

In fact for 6 years it has been the definite national policy to give work to the needy unemployed who are able to work instead of handing out charity to them in the form of food.

It is admitted that the cost per individual of a work program is higher than that of a dole. However, I firmly believe that the advantages which accrue from the maintenance of the morale and self-respect of the worker and the creation of permanent public assets fully justify this increased cost, and that the adoption of the dole as the solution of this problem would be disastrous.

When those who talk glibly and without much information about cutting the cost of relief are pinned down to facts, they are obliged to admit that they can offer only two alternative plans—to cut down the number of needy persons receiving relief or to cut the per capita work payments; or, in other words, make a definite beginning toward the substitution of a dole for work.

It is these same individuals who, picking out a handful of instances in the administration of a huge undertaking, seek to delude the people of this country into the belief that the minor exception is the rule. Let any one of these critics undertake the job of administration himself. That is a challenge which will be avoided but not answered.

There is wide discussion at the present time of various proposals for handling unemployment relief through a system of grants of Federal funds to States with various matching requirements. I believe that such a system has as many disadvantages as there are local political units in the Nation. If grants to States are used for direct relief, we have all the disadvantageous features of the dole which I have previously described. If, on the other hand, such grants are to be used to finance locally conducted work programs, inefficiency and confusion through lack of coordination and uniformity are bound to result. Under either the dole or local work programs the administrative cost will inevitably be much larger than under a federally operated work program.

Furthermore, I am of the opinion that the adoption of a system of direct grants of Federal funds to States would result in the creation of pressure groups striving to increase the amount of such grants, which would bring about a demand for increased appropriations which both the present Congress and future Congresses would find it extremely difficult to resist.

In my message of April 14, 1938, I recommended to the Congress a series of measures designed to check the deflationary processes and the failure of consumers' demand which were occurring at that time. Since the adoption by the Congress of the recovery program outlined in that message, the index of industrial production has increased more than one-quarter. The national income, which amounted to $62,000,000,000 in 1938, is now running at a rate which should increase it to $67,000,000,000 in 1939. This I regard as all-important, because as stated in my message of last April, I believe that if the national income can be increased to $80,000,000,000 our whole economic picture will greatly improve and the problem of unemployment will become much less acute. However, I wish to repeat what I said at that time: I do not believe that this increase in national income can be brought about solely by the expenditure of public funds for relief and recovery purposes.

From the standpoint of private employment, the economic situation has greatly improved. Employment declined steadily and drastically from 1929 to 1932. Improvement began in 1933, and by the early fall of 1937 almost 10,000,000 more persons had jobs than were employed during the month when this administration took office. Average nonagricultural employment during 1937 was within 1,000,000 of the annual average for 1929. After a temporary setback last year, we are now regaining the lost ground. There is every reason to believe that average employment during 1939 will be well in excess of that for 1938. I wish to stress the point that when the situation is viewed in terms of employment, the losses sustained from 1929 to 1932 had practically been wiped out by 1937.

We have found, however, that in spite of substantial recovery as indicated by the amount of employment, the volume of unemployment continues at high levels. This is due in large measure to two factors. The first of these is that the net increase in the labor supply, due to the growth of the working population, is in excess of 500,000 workers annually.

The second prime factor in this picture is the increasing output of the individual worker. At the recovery peak in 1937, when industrial production was at approximately the 1929 level, there were still about 8,000,000 unemployed. From this and subsequent experience, it is apparent that comparatively high levels of production mean substantially less employment than formerly.

In any consideration of the problem of unemployment relief it must be borne in mind that the program adopted to meet it must be envisioned to extend over a considerable period of time. The reason for this is that this Nation, in common with the entire world, is undergoing a process of readjustment, particularly in connection with the production and distribution of goods. Until our economic machinery can be realined to meet present-day conditions, the problem of unemployment will persist and the measures adopted to deal with it must, therefore, be carefully thought out and their operation planned to extend well into the future.

In determining the numbers of persons for whom work on a Federal program should be provided, it is necessary to consider the number of needy able-bodied unemployed. The total unemployment estimates for the Nation run to very large totals, but it must be remembered that these totals cover all persons who desire a job and include many who do not actually have to have a job. In other words, there are in all the unemployment estimates large numbers of persons who can sustain themselves either by reason of private resources or because they can be supported within the family group to which they belong. It is, of course, to be desired that industry should expand to such a degree as to provide employment for all who desire it, but in meeting the problem of need within the limits of the funds which can reasonably be made available for the purpose, the emphasis must necessarily be placed upon the number of unemployed individuals who are actually in need of wages in order to secure the necessities of life.

For the current fiscal year the Congress has provided for the Works Progress Administration appropriations totaling approximately $2,250,000,000. With these funds the Works Progress Administration has provided employment for a maximum of 3,350,000 persons and is currently employing approximately 2,800,000. The average employment provided for the fiscal year will be approximately 3,000,000 persons.

In my Budget message of January 3, 1939, I stated that "Supplemental estimates of appropriations will be submitted to meet the requirements of the Works Progress Administration, the National Youth Administration, and the Farm Security Administration for the fiscal year 1940," and that $1,750,000,000 was the amount estimated for expenditure by these three agencies. I feel that this amount plus such balances of the appropriation for the current year as remain unobligated on June 30, 1939, should cover not only all obligations to be incurred by these agencies during the fiscal year 1940 but the necessary administrative expenses connected therewith which may be incurred by the General Accounting Office, the Civil Aeronautics Authority, the Treasury, and the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, including compensation payments.

For the fiscal year 1940 I recommend, therefore, that the specific sum of $1,477,000,000 be provided for the Works Progress Administration together with any balances of the appropriation for the current year which may remain unobligated on June 30, 1939. This represents a reduction of one-third below the amount provided in the current fiscal year and will permit the employment of slightly more than an average of 2,000,000 persons during the 12 months beginning July 1, 1939. Barring unforeseen and unpredictable developments, we are justified in expecting an upward trend in the volume of employment between now and June 30, 1940, and the sum just named represents my judgment as to the amount that should be provided on the basis of that expectation.

After a review of the accomplishments of jobless workers employed on Works Progress Administration projects, I am impressed with what can be achieved through a program that not only provides jobs for distressed workers but also stimulates purchasing power and tends to induce further recovery. I commend to your attention the miles of roads and streets that have been built, the number of bridges and public buildings that have been constructed, and the worthwhile accomplishments in the fields of education, recreation, sanitation and health, and conservation and flood control. Notwithstanding these accomplishments there is a vast amount of worth-while work remaining to be done. Expenditures in these fields represent permanent, tangible additions to our national wealth.

It is my opinion that the operations of the Works Progress Administration during the next fiscal year should be carried on much as at present but with the reduction that will be possible because of expected increases in private employment and a consequent decline in the need for work relief. Organizational changes which I expect to be made under the authority granted in the recent Reorganization Act will, I anticipate, make possible important economies resulting from the coordination of the operations of various Federal agencies which are engaged in the carrying out of projects.

I wish to state, with emphasis, since the opposite view is frequently expressed, that the program of the Works Progress Administration should, as at present, include some projects of the nonconstruction type to meet the needs of those unemployed workers whose training is such that they are not adapted to employment on construction projects. The provision of work for those people at occupations which will conserve their skills is of prime importance, and the emphasis placed upon construction projects should not obscure the necessity for this portion of the program.

A committee of the House of Representatives, under the authority of an enabling resolution, is now conducting an investigation of the Works Progress Administration. I sincerely hope that this investigation will be guided along constructive lines, and if this is done I feel sure that its outcome will be to demonstrate the wisdom of the measures which have been adopted to meet the needs of the unemployed. In discussions of the projects of the Works Progress Administration there is a tendency to enlarge upon criticism of a few isolated projects to an extent which obscures the real character and value of the program as a whole. In an undertaking of this size there are inevitably individual instances which may be subject to criticism, but when the criticism of a very small fraction of the work being carried on is magnified to such an extent as to obscure the great good that is being achieved on the whole, all sense of proportion and relative value is lost.

In my message to the Congress of January 5, 1939, I suggested that a study be made of the methods by which funds appropriated to the Works Progress Administration should be distributed. Any formula that may be devised for this purpose and written into legislation should take in account not only the factor of population, but also the constantly changing economic and unemployment conditions in various sections of the country. Allocations should be made on the basis of jobs to be provided and not on the local basis of funds to be distributed. Furthermore, the formula should not be too rigid and should permit a substantial amount of administrative discretion in order to provide sufficient flexibility to meet special situations and relief crises.

The matter of the contributions of sponsors to Works Progress Administration projects has been satisfactorily covered by the provisions of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1938, which placed a limit upon the amount of Federal funds that can be used for purposes other than the payment of wages. I suggest a continuation of this practice rather than the imposition of a percentage basis on which sponsors would be required to participate. With an appropriation made available for an entire fiscal year, negotiations with sponsors can be conducted upon a much more satisfactory basis, and it can be confidently expected that the proportion of sponsors' contributions will be appreciably increased. The complications which have arisen during the current fiscal year from the fact that three separate appropriations have been made to finance the operations of the Works Progress Administration have militated against efficiency of operation and made it difficult to secure the fullest financial participation of sponsors on projects.

The Congress has recently made provisions against improper political activity on the part of persons connected with the work-relief program—provisions affecting not only Federal employees, but all persons who may be in a position to bring improper pressure to bear. Such legislation was recommended in my message of January 5, 1939, and has my hearty endorsement. However, insofar as the administrative employees of the Works Progress Administration and of the other agencies connected with the work-relief program are concerned, I believe that the political provisions just mentioned would be more constructive, and their enforcement would be simpler, if the Congress would place such employees within the classified civil service.

The greatest single resource of this country is its youth, and no progressive government can afford to ignore the needs of its future citizens for adequate schooling and for that useful work which establishes them as a part of its economy. To ignore this need is to undermine the very basis of democracy which requires the constant renewal of its vitality through the absorption of its young people.

The National Youth Administration, as an entity now within the Works Progress Administration, has during the past 4 years developed a program which has proved its effectiveness in meeting this need. Its program is primarily one of work, work to enable needy students to secure an education, and work to enable unemployed needy young people who are out of school to make use of their capacities for public benefit and so in turn to earn a wage and acquire that work experience so essential to future effective employment. The National Youth Administration has supplemented its work program with other services directed toward increasing the effectiveness of young people as workers and securing their placement in regular employment.

It is my belief that we should now give official recognition to the fact that the needs of youth are different from those of unemployed older workers. I further believe that, based on the demonstrated ability of its program to meet these needs at low cost, and our knowledge of the wide and still unmet need among young people for its services, Congress should provide for an expansion of its activities.

For the National Youth Administration I am requesting an appropriation of $125,000,000 for the fiscal year 1940, together with the unobligated balances on June 30, 1939, of the appropriation to that Administration for the current fiscal year.

I am requesting further that the National Youth Administration be established as a separate agency to continue and expand its program for assisting needy young people. This will not increase existing overhead.

While the amount which I am recommending will not meet all the needs of all our young people, it will mean that education, training, work experience, and help toward private employment can be extended to many needy young people who are now eagerly waiting to take their place in our society as responsible workers and citizens.

It has been the function of the Farm Security Administration to provide assistance for hundreds of thousands of destitute and low-income farm families through supervised loans and guidance in sound farming practices, through adjustment of farmers' debts, and, where necessary, by direct subsistence grants. This program has kept thousands of farmers off relief and has enabled them, largely through their own efforts, to become self-supporting American citizens and to assume their rightful place in rural life. Aside from the further development of camps for migratory farm laborers, construction under the resettlement program will have been completed by the close of the current fiscal year, although in a few instances it may be necessary to provide funds for land development work.

For the foregoing activities of the Farm Security Administration I recommend an appropriation of $123,000,000 for the fiscal year 1940, together with such balances of the current appropriation as may remain unobligated on June 30, 1939.

Owing to the language of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts, for the last 2 years it has been necessary to use funds allocated to or appropriated to the Department of Agriculture to provide for relief for Indians which come under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior. I feel that it would be preferable to have these funds appropriated directly to the Department primarily responsible for the welfare of the Indians.

In view of the foregoing I recommend an appropriation of $1,350,000 for the Indian Service for the fiscal year 1940 to be available for the continuation of Indian rehabilitation and relief projects, including necessary administrative expenses.

For the following agencies for administrative expenses incident to carrying out the purposes for which the foregoing appropriations have been requested, I recommend the amounts indicated:

(1) Civil Aeronautics Authority		$250,000
(2) General Accounting Office		5,225,000
(3) Treasury Department:
(a) Procurement Division	$5,200,000
(b) Division of Disbursements	2,500,000
(c) Office of the Treasurer	675,000
(d) Secret Service	250,000
(e) Division of Accounts and Deposits	6,000,000
(f) Public Health Service	300,000
		14,925,000
(4) U. S. Employees' Compensation Commission		5,250,000

The funds recommended for appropriation to the United States Employees' Compensation Commission are sufficient to provide for the reimbursement of Federal hospitals for hospitalization of persons paid from relief appropriations in the same manner as they are now reimbursed for the hospitalization of other Federal employees paid from regular appropriations. I feel that the necessary authority to make such payments should be included in this year's legislation.

I request also that in connection with the foregoing appropriations, as in the past, provision be made to continue the work of the National Emergency Council, the National Resources Committee, and the rural-rehabilitation program of the Puerto Rican Reconstruction Administration. For this purpose I recommend the following appropriations for the fiscal year 1940:

(1) National Emergency Council	$1,500,000
(2) National Resources Committee	990,000
(3) Puerto Rico Reconstruction Administration	10,000,000

In order that the agencies concerned may have an opportunity to formulate definite plans for the next fiscal year it is desirable that the necessary legislation be enacted at as early a date as possible and that the funds be made available on the passage of this legislation.

It may be of interest to the Congress to know that through the Department of State we have received many assertions that there are few unemployed persons in the nations which have accepted totalitarian forms of government.

In those nations private employment takes care of a smaller proportion of their employable citizens than private employment does in the United States.

This means that government employment is responsible for the care of a larger portion of the employable population than in this country, creating in fact a government employment system, based in great part on the manufacture of munitions, which costs far more than our system.

The principal difference is that in the nations to which I refer, this employment is called employment, whereas in the United States it is called relief.

Actually, our system of work relief is relatively far cheaper than the other method and as at present constituted does take care of the great majority of the needy unemployed who are able to work.

I trust that the people will not be deceived by the terminology and will not assume that the totalitarian methods of government are more effective than our own.

The system which we have favored in the United States during the past 6 years is by no means perfect. It can be improved, but not at the expense of substituting the dole for work relief, nor by turning the management of works projects back to the sole care of the many thousands of local governments. It will be said by history, after much political smoke has cleared away, that the Federal Government's handling of work relief has been one of our most efficient administrative accomplishments.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 27, 1939.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message, with the accompanying papers, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I note with considerable gratification that in this message the President comes out in support of distributing funds to the States by a formula. I quote:

> Any formula that may be devised for this purpose and written into legislation should take in account not only the factor of population but also the constantly changing economic and unemployment conditions in various sections of the country. Allocations should be made on the basis of jobs to be provided and not on the local basis of funds to be distributed.

As a member of the Special Committee on Unemployment and Relief, I may say that those of us in the minority have constantly contended for a formula in the allocation of the funds. Last year a motion to that effect was defeated in the Senate by a vote of 56 to 17. This year the formula was not only recommended but all members of the minority of the committee signed a report recommending allocation of the benefits on the basis of jobs to be provided. The language which the President uses in this message is virtually verbatim the language which we used in our report.

It would indeed be gratifying to think that the President had read the minority views of the Republican members of the Committee on Unemployment and Relief, but whether he has or has not it is certainly a great thing for the country that he has come out in support of them.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am a member of the majority of the committee, and I wish to say that the majority members of the committee have steadfastly and at all times held out for the adoption of a formula for the allocation of the funds. I think that is correct, without question.

There has been some difference from time to time between the majority members and the minority members as to the formula which should be agreed upon, but never at any time have the majority members of the committee had any opposition to a formula. Under the leadership of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], we have been most strenuous in our efforts not only to adopt a formula, but to find out what would be a proper formula, which is no small task or undertaking, I am sure all Senators who have given any thought or study to the question will agree.

I also wish to make a remark about the message of the President in general, with which I may say I am in wholehearted sympathy and accord. I call attention to the fact that in the message the President has pointed out the decrease in the amount of money necessary to be appropriated for the coming year, thus carrying out the very principles for which not only the President of the United States but for which the Democratic majority in the Congress have always argued and contended, that necessary and proper as the work has been, as beneficial as it has been for the country, the time must come when we will have to reduce expenditures. That time can only come, in the view and opinion of many of us, when our national income rises correspondingly. The President wisely points out the rise in national income which is taking place.

I am sure I will be pardoned for making a brief reference to the part of the message of the President, which I now read, not only because I heartily approve of it, but because there is pending in the other branch of the Congress a bill which deals with the subject the President now discusses:

> The Congress has recently made provisions against improper political activity on the part of persons connected with the work-relief program—provisions affecting not only Federal employees, but all persons who may be in a position to bring improper pressure to bear. Such legislation was recommended in my message of January 5, 1939, and has my hearty endorsement.

I am reminded now that at the time those amendments were being discussed on the floor the leader on this side asked if the amendment covered the features of the President's message in January of this year. The President's message says:

> Such legislation was recommended * * * and has my hearty endorsement.

The bill to which I referred as pending in the other House of the Congress makes those provisions of law to which the President refers permanent legislation, and if they are enacted it will not be necessary to incorporate them each year in the appropriation bills. But for the benefit of the Committee on Appropriations I ask, in line with the President's suggestion, that in the new bill those provisions which were contained in the bill written this spring be rewritten.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in this connection, and in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], I may say that in the bill now on the calendar, which came from the Committee on Unemployment and Relief, of which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is chairman, there is a section providing a formula for the allocation of funds appropriated for relief purposes. The question of how to distribute these funds has been before Congress when each appropriation has been under consideration.

It is not an easy matter to devise an exact formula which will do justice to all the States. What we are all trying to do is to provide relief from unemployment, and there are some States in the Union where the unemployment situation may not be reflected in any sort of census which may be taken. That is true particularly of agricultural States. Unemployment in the rural sections is not always reflected by the unemployment records in the cities of those States, because it is not so easy for a man in a rural section to walk or ride a few blocks to find an employment office, or a W. P. A. certifying agent, where he may register as unemployed.

The committee in considering that question, and I think the Congress in considering it must decide whether a formula which is based purely on some unemployment census in the States would work equitably and justly among all the States. So, in order to arrive at what seemed to be a fair compromise, the Byrnes bill reported from the Committee on Unemployment and Relief provides a formula, one half of the amount to be distributed according to population, and the other half according to unemployment.

In dealing with this question, we have attempted to arrive at a formula, and by splitting the fund in two parts, and basing its allocation one half on population and the other half on unemployment, according to the records of unemployment, the committee felt that that would work out a just formula for consideration as nearly as was possible.

It would not be fair to base the allocation entirely on population, because, it seems to me, that would not recognize sufficiently certain States which may or may not have a proportion of population relative to the population of the whole country. To base it entirely upon unemployment might be an injustice to some other States where the unemployed are not registered in any office recognized by the Government.

If any fairer or more just formula can be devised, I am certainly ready to accept it. But the committee from which this bill came was not able to work out a different formula, one which they thought would be fairer to all the States in proportion both to population and to unemployment.

When the matter comes before the Senate again, either in a substantive bill or in a bill making appropriations for next year's relief work, I am sure the Senate and the House together will be able to work out a just and equitable formula, insofar as that can be done.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. As I understood the Senator's explanation with reference to the previous comment of the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Kentucky said that one of the objects of the committee was to be fair to the States. I think I quote him correctly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I meant to all of them, yes; so far as possible.

Mr. DANAHER. As I apprehend the problem of unemployment as a national one, if we are to be fair to the States in the matter of distribution, it would seem to me that fairness might depend, in that aspect of it, on the basis of the contributions by the States pro rata toward the cost of meeting such a national problem. I fail to see the logic in the explanation offered by the senior Senator from Kentucky, and it would seem to me that in any attempt to reach a fair formula in that particular we ought very properly to ascertain the extent of unemployment by States, and return relief administration to the States on a Federal grants-in-aid basis.

Mr. BARKLEY. Neither the President's message nor the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts were based on any proposition involving contributions of the States to relief, or upon the question of the Federal Government putting up money and turning it over to the States to be expended by them. I was directing my remarks to the question of the formula. Whatever may be the requirement as to local contribution, it seems to me that would have no material effect on the formula by which the Federal Government would distribute its contributions.

I may say frankly to the Senator, while I am on my feet, inasmuch as he has injected the question, that I would not be in favor of the Federal Government putting up the money for relief, and then, without any strings upon it or any control over it, either as to personnel or type of project, turn it over to local authorities exclusively for administration.

Mr. DANAHER. Of course, Mr. President, my comment was based upon the Senator using as a touchstone, or test of his logic, fairness to the States in the matter of allotments and the matter of the quota.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator, as I understand, advocates turning the control back to the States. I do not know whether he means that the States shall put up the amount of money necessary to carry on relief or works projects, but he seems to wish to put upon the Government the lion's share of the contribution, but let the States control.

Mr. DANAHER. The problem is a national one. If we allot money when the Byrnes bill or any other bill comes along and raises the question, it seems to me it must be done logically and fairly to meet the job situation, or the amount and extent of unemployment per State. On no other basis can it logically be able to operate.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the formula cannot be worked out on a basis of how much a State is to be required to put up in order that the Federal Government will put up anything.

Mr. DANAHER. Of course not, Mr. President.

Mr. BARKLEY. So my remarks had no relation to that matter. We were talking about the formula under which the Government would contribute.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator will remember that he had undertaken to find this formula in terms of being fair to the States. That is the only reason I was impelled to comment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the question of being fair to the States does not necessarily revolve around how much the States will be required to put up. I imagine no State will complain of unfairness if the Federal Government puts up the larger portion of the amount to be spent on public projects. The only situation I can imagine in which a State would complain of unfairness would be that the Federal Government required it to put up more than it could put up, or that it thought it ought to, in view of the fact that unemployment is a national question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I came into the Senate a moment ago and heard a discussion between the leader and my friend upon the other side, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER]. What I wish to say is not pertinent to the bill under discussion, but it seems to me it is pertinent to the discussion in which the two distinguished Senators to whom I referred have just been engaged. I think that the proper way of handling the relief situation has not as yet been adopted. It seems to me that the American people are rapidly coming to the point of considering that they are wards of the Federal Government. They want the Federal Government to take care of the unemployed. They appeal to the Federal Government for large contributions for housing and for practically every activity which belongs within the realm of private endeavor.

Some months ago I introduced a measure which I conceived to be of merit in dealing with the question of unemployment. I beg the Senate's indulgence for a few moments while I speak of it. The bill provides for allocation of funds to the States to provide relief and work relief. It provides:

That the President is hereby authorized to allocate to the States in the manner hereinafter provided any sums appropriated by the Congress for the purpose of enabling the States to meet the burdens of unemployment and to provide relief and work relief (including relief and work relief extended to needy young persons who have been unable to obtain employment or who would be unable to continue their education without assistance from the States).

The Governor of the State, in order to obtain the allocation which the President is authorized to make, would have to pursue the following course:

SEC. 2. (a) The Governor of any State may from time to time make application to the President for an allocation to his State of funds from any such sums. Any such application shall be in such form and shall contain such information as may, from time to time, be prescribed by the President, and shall be accompanied by a certificate signed by the Governor certifying—

(1) that such State is unable to meet the burdens of depression and unemployment and to supply the necessary means to prevent distress among its needy unemployed citizens and residents;

(2) that such State has made every practicable effort to meet its unemployment demands and to provide relief and work relief for its citizens and residents;

(3) detailed information with respect to the provisions that have been made by such State and its political subdivisions for relief and work relief and in relieving unemployment;

(4) the reasons why such State and its political subdivisions are unable to meet the demands and needs for relief within such State;

(5) that such State has set up a nonpartisan organization for the purpose of administering State relief; that such nonpartisan organization shall administer any funds that may be allocated to such State under this act; and that such organization has been and is efficiently operated and is so organized as to expend properly any funds that may be provided either by such State or under this act; and

(6) the purposes for which any funds that may be allocated to such State under this act shall be utilized and how such funds shall be disbursed.

In other words, the responsibility would rest upon the States to take care of the unemployed; and if a Governor, upon honor, certified that his State had so great a burden that it could not properly care for its responsibility, then, if he had set up such an organization as indicated, nonpartisan in character, and provided meritorious projects, he could then appeal to the Federal Government—that is, to the President—for relief. The bill provides:

(b) Upon receipt of any such application and certificate filed on behalf of a State, the President shall make such investigation as he may deem appropriate with respect to the facts set forth in such application and certificate. If, upon completion of such investigation, the President determines that an allocation of funds should be made pursuant to such application, he shall determine the amount of funds which should be so allocated and shall allocate such amount of funds to such State. The President shall then certify to the Governor of such State and to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of such allocation. Thereafter, upon request of the Governor, the funds so allocated to such State shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to such agency or agencies of such State or political subdivisions thereof as the Governor may designate, and at such times and in such amounts as the Governor may request.

SEC. 3. The President is authorized to appoint, without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws, such officers and employees as he may deem necessary to enable him to carry out the provisions of this act.

There are other provisions, but they are all dependent upon the ones to which I have referred.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if we should adopt a plan of that character the States and the people within the States would more and more appreciate the fact that the responsibility rests upon the States; that they have problems which they may not devolve exclusively upon the Federal Government. Under the terms of the bill, after such agencies have been established in the States adequate to meet the situation, and the President is satisfied with the facts presented, then he may make such allocation of such funds as Congress may appropriate to meet the situation.

I believe that a measure of that kind would work a great reform and relieve us of many of the unpleasant experiences through which we have gone in the past.

TRANSCONTINENTAL TOLL ROADS AND FREE HIGHWAY DEVELOPMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a while ago I had the floor to discuss briefly the unfinished business, and I yielded in order that a message from the President could be laid before the Senate. I understand the President has sent two other messages to the Senate, and I ask that they now be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, concurred in by the Secretary of War, enclosing a report of the Bureau of Public Roads, United States Department of Agriculture, on the feasibility of a system of transcontinental toll roads and a master plan for free highway development.

The report, prepared at the request of the Congress, is the first complete assembly of data on the use being made of our national highway network. It points definitely to the corrective measures of greatest urgency and shows that existing improvements may be fully utilized in meeting ultimate highway needs.

It emphasizes the need of a special system of direct interregional highways, with all necessary connections through and around cities, designed to meet the requirements of the national defense and the needs of a growing peacetime traffic of longer range.

It shows that there is need for superhighways, but makes it clear that this need exists only where there is congestion on the existing roads, and mainly in metropolitan areas. Improved facilities, need for the solution of city street congestion, are shown to occupy a fundamental place in the general replanning of the cities indicated as necessary in the report Our Cities, issued in September 1937 by the National Resources Committee.

The report also points definitely to difficulties of right-of-way acquisition as obstacles to a proper development of both rural highways and city streets and makes important and useful recommendations for dealing with these difficulties.

I call the special attention of the Congress to the discussion of the principle of "excess taking" of land for highways. I lay great emphasis on this because by adopting the principle of "excess taking" of land the ultimate cost to the Government of a great national system of highways will be greatly reduced.

For instance, we all know that it is largely a matter of chance if a new highway is located through one man's land and misses another man's land a few miles away. Yet the man who by good fortune sells a narrow right-of-way for a new highway makes, in most cases, a handsome profit through the increase in value of all of the rest of his land. That represents an unearned increment of profit—a profit which comes to a mere handful of lucky citizens and which is denied to the vast majority.

Under the exercise of the principle of "excess taking" of land the Government, which puts up the cost of the highway, buys a wide strip on each side of the highway itself, uses it for the rental of concessions and sells it off over a period of years to home builders and others who wish to live near a main artery of travel. Thus the Government gets the unearned increment and reimburses itself in large part for the building of the road.

In its full discussion of the whole highway problem and the wealth of exact data it supplies, the report indicates the broad outlines of what might be regarded as a master plan for the development of all of the highway and street facilities of the Nation.

I recommend the report for the consideration of the Congress as a basis for needed action to solve our highway problems.

INTERTERRITORIAL FREIGHT-RATE PROBLEM—SURVEY BY THE T. V. A.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

Herewith I submit a survey entitled "Supplemental Phases of the Interterritorial Freight-Rate Problem of the United States," which survey was conducted by the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, pursuant to Executive Order No. 6161 (June 8, 1933), by which are delegated to it certain powers granted to me by sections 22 and 23 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933.

I am, also, herewith submitting a letter from the Tennessee Valley Authority, dated the 6th day of February 1939, forwarding the aforesaid survey to me, explaining its relation to the initial report on this subject submitted to the Congress on June 7, 1937, and published as House Document No. 264 (75th Cong., 1st sess.). This letter also restates the views of the Authority on the effects upon our national economy of the regional freight-rate discrimination disclosed in the two reports, and urges the adoption of appropriate legislation to eliminate this discrimination.

I invite the attention of the Congress to the suggestion, contained in the Authority's letter, that the report, with its accompanying tables and charts, be published as an official document.

PUBLIC-SCHOOL BUILDING, FORT PECK RESERVATION, WOLF POINT, MONT.—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 70)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair) laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the United States Senate:

I am returning herewith without my approval enrolled bill S. 961, to authorize an appropriation of $50,000 for cooperation with the public-school board at Wolf Point, Mont., for completing the construction, extension, equipment, and improvement of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.

The Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935, approved on August 12, 1935 (49 Stat. 571), included $50,000 for cooperation with the public-school board at Wolf Point in the construction or improvement of a public-school building to be available to Indian children of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation. Although this sum is to be recouped by the United States over a period of 30 years, it is my view that the extension of further financial assistance to the school district for the construction or improvement of school buildings would not be justified. It appears that, at the close of the fiscal year 1938, the district had on hand the sum of $27,000. This would indicate that it is not in a serious condition financially.

I am informed that there are 940 white children and 280 Indian children in the district; that is, one-third of the children living in the district are Indians. Somewhat less than one-fourth of the number enrolled in the Wolf Point public schools are Indians. The Department of the Interior is paying tuition for the 160 Indian children enrolled and, if a good attendance of Indian children is maintained, the district can earn something over $16,700 through tuition payments.

For the foregoing reasons, I am compelled to withhold approval of the bill.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 27, 1939.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Calloway, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4492) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, and that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 34 and 36 to the bill, and concurred therein each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5219) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1939, and June 30, 1940, and for other purposes; that the House had receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 17, 19, and 20 to the bill, and concurred therein, and that the House receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12 to the bill and concurred therein with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 279) making supplemental appropriations for printing and binding and stationery for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 279) making supplemental appropriations for printing and binding and stationery for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

STREAM POLLUTION CONTROL

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 685) to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement with reference to the bill which has been made the unfinished business of the Senate. I will say at the outset that I hope we may dispose of the bill this afternoon. If we do, it is my purpose to move an adjournment until Monday.

The bill under consideration deals with stream pollution. We all realize that as population has increased, and our industrial development has been concentrated along our navigable—and in some cases nonnavigable—waterways, the question of protecting the health and the lives of the people has become in some communities very important and acute.

I do not wish publicly to name any sections of the country or any cities, although they were referred to in the hearings. However, in certain communities in the United States, by reason of the pollution of water either by cities or by manufacturing plants, the water has become a menace to the health and life of the people. In some communities the public-health authorities have been on the verge of condemning the water supply because of its impurity. Various State health authorities have attempted to deal with the question, and in many cases have dealt with it in considerable degree, but not adequately.

In nearly all the States where there are navigable streams, or streams which flow into navigable rivers, or into harbors or bodies of water of any sort, the health authorities have been giving their attention to methods by which the supply of water might be kept pure in order not to endanger the lives and health of the people.

Moreover, as our population has increased and our industrial development has been concentrated, the public authorities in the States, counties, and cities have been compelled, as a matter of self-defense, to give attention to these problems and try to work out a solution.

I dare say that no industrial plant in America would deliberately, and with malice or premeditation, pollute the supply of water to be consumed by the people. I dare say no municipality in the country would deliberately do so; and yet the conditions are such that innocently, and without any such intention, probably due to lack of suitable precautions taken in advance, and in many cases inability for financial and other reasons to install the necessary purification devices, a condition has grown up under which it has become necessary for Congress to take note of the problem and deal with it.

This problem has been before Congress for a number of years. Hearings have been had before the appropriate committees of the House and Senate. In the previous Congress I introduced a bill in the Senate—and a companion bill was introduced in the House—undertaking to make a beginning in working out the solution of the question of stream pollution. The bill passed both House and Senate almost unanimously, and went to the White House. It was vetoed by the President on the sole ground that the bill did not provide that the appropriation authorized should go through the Budget Director. So for purely budgetary reasons the President vetoed the measure and sent it back to the Congress. I have reintroduced the bill practically as it was passed by the two Houses, eliminating the objectionable part which brought about the President's veto.

The bill sets up in the Public Health Service what is called a Division of Stream Pollution. It authorizes the Division of Stream Pollution, under the direction of the Surgeon General and in cooperation with the Chief of Engineers of the Army, to make a survey and investigation of stream pollution throughout the country, and to work out a plan in cooperation with the States and communities. The Division of Stream Pollution is to be made up largely of sanitary engineer officers in the Public Health Service. As I say, the bill sets up a Division of Stream Pollution, and authorizes the Surgeon General and the Division of Stream Pollution to investigate conditions, work out plans and submit them to Congress, and cooperate with the health officers of all States, counties, and municipalities in a voluntary effort to clean up the unclean conditions which exist in certain of our streams out of which the people take their drinking water and the water which they use for all purposes.

The bill also gives the consent of Congress to the formation of compacts among States for the purpose of making their own arrangements and entering into their own agreements to bring about the purification of streams which are subject to conditions which may endanger the public health and life.

The bill provides for reports to be made to Congress. It also provides that cities and municipalities which, through their sewerage systems or otherwise, are emptying into navigable streams or their tributaries unclean matter which is conducive to injury to health and life, shall be eligible for what are called grants-in-aid and loans to enable them to carry out purification projects.

It also makes eligible for loans and grants-in-aid certain persons or corporations engaged in the manufacture of commodities of any sort on the banks of streams or upon their tributaries whose operations result in unclean conditions. In other words, the bill proposes to begin a plan of cooperation between the Federal Government and States, counties, cities, and private industries in an effort to rectify the conditions which I have described.

There is no opposition anywhere to making this effort. No one, I think, would take the position that we ought not to make a beginning in cleaning up the streams, because it is, of course, inconsistent for us, as a nation, to undertake to improve health conditions, to undertake to improve housing conditions, to undertake to set in motion those governmental activities which may contribute to what we have always been pleased to call "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," if we are not willing, in the light of new conditions which we confront, from time to time to take the steps that are necessary to effectuate those purposes and to protect the people against their loss. The only difference of opinion, Mr. President, among those who advocate taking the step is as to the method to be adopted in doing so, and the length to which we ought to go in the initial step to bring about correction of stream-pollution conditions.

The bill which I have introduced, and which was passed by the Senate in the last Congress, as I have said, is a voluntary measure; there is no compulsion about it. I feel, as many of those, I believe most of those, who advocate legislation along this line feel, that in taking the first step we ought to take it cautiously; we ought to take it by way of cooperation between the Federal Government and the local governments and local industries, and then, if, after we have taken that step and have brought about as great a degree of purification and correction of this condition as is possible under the cooperative method, it is found necessary to adopt more drastic means in order to accomplish the result. Congress, of course, will be here to adopt those means as the need may be revealed.

After this bill was introduced and after it was reported unanimously by the subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce and reported unanimously by the Committee on Commerce to the Senate and put on the calendar, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] introduced a bill dealing with the same subject, but dealing with it differently. He proposes to make the enforcement agency the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army. I may say that both bills provide for the creation of stream-pollution districts throughout the country and set up boards for that purpose; but the bill introduced by the Senator from Missouri provides that the Federal Government may institute injunction proceedings to compel a city or town or county or a private industry immediately to inaugurate the necessary proceedings and reforms in its set-up to bring about a cessation of the conditions which cause stream pollution. Those of us who advocate the voluntary method feel that throughout the country there are probably hundreds of communities, and it may be hundreds of private industries, that did not by design or premeditation set about to pollute the streams. They have been innocent so far as the violation of any law is concerned; they have not desired to bring about conditions that would endanger life and health. It has been one of those things which, like Topsy, just grew up.

It seems to me that to bring about as the first step the possibility of the Federal Government going into the Federal courts and enjoining a county, or a city, or even an industry that is not physically or financially able immediately to clean up its situation without first attempting to bring about the necessary cooperation by voluntary means, is taking too drastic a step at the beginning, and that it ought not to be done.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMATHERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Does the Senator apprehend that the interstate compact feature requires the consent of Congress?

Mr. BARKLEY. Congress in this bill is giving its consent to the States to enter into such compacts. I imagine that it would be necessary, where a navigable stream forms a boundary between two States, for the States involved—certainly it would be desirable, at least, for them—to enter into a compact in order that arrangements might be worked out in an amicable way and with justice to both States. I understand that already in the East there is an understanding, or a working agreement, between the State of New York and the State of New Jersey, dealing with the East River and the Hudson River and other streams in the vicinity of the metropolis of the Nation. I do not know whether or not that answers the Senator's question, but I think it is desirable that provision be carried in the bill whereby Congress gives its consent to States to enter into compacts. The mere entering into compacts shows on the part of the States good faith and a desire to work out the matter locally, not through compulsion but through cooperation.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield further to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. If the Senator will pardon a further interruption, I have in mind that there has been for several years the Ohio River compact which has at least seven signatories, and I think additional States have been added this year. Does the Senator happen to know whether or not the Ohio River compact has had the approval of Congress?

Mr. BARKLEY. I cannot offhand say; I do not recall that it has been submitted to Congress; I do not pretend to be accurate about that; but I have no recollection with reference to it.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, may I further ask if the Senator is aware that representatives of four States and the District of Columbia have met within the last month to contemplate and arrange for an interstate compact affecting the Potomac River?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I have noticed that negotiations have been proceeding dealing with the Potomac River.

Mr. DANAHER. So, we come back specifically, then, to my original question, if the States may legally enter into compacts among ourselves for the correction of this problem, wherein does the Senator apprehend that the consent of Congress is required?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, as the Senator knows, the consent of Congress has always been understood to be required in order that the States may enter into compacts.

Sometimes such compacts are submitted to Congress for ratification after they are entered into. There is now pending, I believe, before the Congress a compact between certain New England States that affects the distribution of power growing out of power dams. That compact has never been ratified. Sometimes Congress gives its consent in advance. Whether such advance consent precludes the necessity of bringing it back to Congress for ratification may be open to question; but I think that certainly where a compact among States would affect navigable rivers, over which the United States has jurisdiction, it would require the consent of Congress in order that the compact might become effective.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. That is the very question I was about to discuss with the Senator from Kentucky. I ask him whether or not the bill which he has introduced and which is now pending before the Senate requires congressional approval after a compact has been entered into by and between various States?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think it does require a compact to be brought back to the Congress. I will refer to the section.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to ask a further question, whether or not there is anything in the bill which would, in any wise, tend to interfere with navigation in connection with the provisions seeking to prevent or control stream pollution along the various rivers?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is nothing in this proposed legislation, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, that in any way impairs the jurisdiction of the Congress over the regulation of navigation of the various streams. It does authorize the Surgeon General to cooperate with the Chief of the Corps of Engineers of the Army in working out plans by which stream pollution devices shall be installed, but it is not contemplated that any such devices will interfere with navigation and, if they should do so, there is nothing in the bill which would in any way take away from Congress or from the Federal Government, or the Corps of Engineers, under acts of Congress, the right to regulate such matters insofar as navigation is concerned.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the only question I have in mind is the right of Congress ultimately to approve State compacts. It strikes me that it is the better part of wisdom, when we delegate the power, in the first instance for the States to enter into compacts whether the control of stream pollution or any other matter affecting the rights of the States, and that then it is a pretty safe practice for the States to submit such compacts to the Congress in order that Congress may ascertain what they have done, and approve the action taken.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will read the section. It is very brief:

> (c) The consent of the Congress is hereby given to two or more States to enter into agreements or compacts, not in conflict with any law of the United States, for cooperative effort and mutual assistance for the prevention and abatement of water pollution and the enforcement of their respective laws relating thereto, and to establish such agencies, joint or otherwise, as they may deem desirable for making effective such agreements and compacts.

That provision does not require that the compacts shall be brought back to Congress; but it does provide that the compacts shall not in any way be in violation of any act of Congress. Of course, that presupposes any future act as well as any act in the past, because under the Constitution Congress always retains its right to regulate commerce, which means the regulation of the means of commerce, including our navigable streams.

So far as I am personally concerned, I should have no objection to requiring that the compacts be brought back to Congress for ratification; but such a provision was omitted because it did not seem of sufficient importance to justify the possible delay involved in bringing about these compacts, which really are to deal with the cooperative efforts of the States in enforcing their own laws on the subject of sanitation as well as the prevention of stream pollution.

Mr. LUCAS. But if I correctly understand the matter, one section of the bill provides that the Army engineers shall work in conjunction with the engineers of the various States, and that the compacts must have the approval of the Army engineers before they can be made effective.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, that would be true if they affected navigation. If a compact did not affect navigation—for instance, if it dealt with a device located on some nonnavigable tributary of a navigable stream—while, of course, the Chief of Engineers would be consulted in regard to the possibility of any such device built on a nonnavigable tributary affecting the navigation of the stream into which it might flow, it is hardly conceivable that in working out these stream-purification devices the navigation of a navigable river would be in any way interfered with.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield, unless the Senator from Illinois desires to ask further questions.

Mr. LUCAS. No; that is all I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky.

In conclusion, if I may make one further observation, I will say that, having lived in the Illinois Valley all my life, and having personally witnessed some of the things that have happened to plant, vegetable, and fish life in the Illinois River as a result of the pollution of the streams, it strikes me that the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky is a most meritorious one. I merely wanted to discuss with him primarily the question of compacts between the States because I still think, as I said at first, that it is the best practice to leave nothing to the States in the beginning that the Congress of the United States might not ultimately approve.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, I will say to the Senator that section 2 of the bill provides that the Division of Stream Pollution—

> Shall, after careful investigation, and in cooperation with the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, other Federal agencies, and the agencies of the several States authorized by law or duly designated to deal with water pollution, and in cooperation with the municipalities and industries involved, prepare comprehensive plans for eliminating or reducing the pollution and improving the sanitary condition of the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto—

And so forth. They are required to cooperate with the Chief of Engineers of the War Department.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do.

Mr. DANAHER. As bearing upon the question of the Senator from Illinois and the reply of the Senator from Kentucky, I should like the Senator's permission to read into the RECORD at this point a provision from article I, section 10 of the Constitution:

> No State shall, without the consent of Congress * * * enter into any agreement or compact with another State.

That quotation, of course, excises the irrelevant language.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is true. I think the Constitutional Convention had in view the possibility that at some time in the future States might undertake to enter into agreements that might very materially affect the power of the Federal Government itself, and in that very article they provided against such agreements.

Mr. DANAHER. Since a great part of the core of this bill finds me in complete agreement with its purpose, but I differ from the Senator from Kentucky as a matter of principle in other particulars, I have asked permission to interject into the RECORD at this point that particular reference, for later use.

I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that is all I wish to say. That, in brief, explains the bill. I think Senators understand it. For the time being, I yield the floor.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, at the time Senate bill 685 was first called up I submitted an amendment and asked that it lie on the table. The amendment has been printed, and I ask that it be read at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, it is proposed to strike out lines 7 to 25, inclusive.

On page 5, it is proposed to strike out lines 1 to 19, inclusive.

On page 5, it is proposed to strike out lines 20 to 25, inclusive, and all of pages 6, 7, 8, and 9 down to and including line 22 on page 10.

On page 12, it is proposed to strike out lines 1 to 14, inclusive.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, insofar as the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky undertakes to create a Division of Water Pollution and inject it into the United States Public Health Service, there can be no slightest objection. Insofar as it would conform to our general understanding of centralizing a bureau as a clearing house, so to speak, for information as to water-pollution-control methods, such a division would be of eminent value.

There is no question that the division should encourage cooperative activities among the several States looking to the eradication of water pollution. It seems to me there can be no quarrel with the objective of granting permission in advance for States to enter into interstate compacts. I believe the leading feature of the bill is the largest and the most eminently worth-while contribution of this particular measure, in that in advance it encourages the States to enter into interstate compacts looking to pollution control.

There surely is no objection to section 3 nor to section 4 of the bill as drawn.

When, however, we get into the idea of grants-in-aid from the United States Treasury to the several States, or even to persons, to corporations, to mining concerns and the like, we are entering into a brand-new field. If we are to undertake to make grants-in-aid from the United States Treasury to these individuals, if you choose, who pollute the waters and then come to the United States Treasury and ask for appropriations to rid the waters of the pollution which they themselves have brought about, it seems to me we shall have gone a long way outside the scope of what we have hitherto known as proper governmental activity. It seems to me that once we undertake to make grants-in-aid, the next step will be that we shall be annually expected to keep up the water-pollution treatment that is undertaken pursuant to this Division of Water Pollution Control.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I am not very familiar with the bill, not being a member of the committee which considered it. Does the Senator contend that the bill would require the States or the Federal Government to make grants to the States to aid in the removal of pollution which, for instance, a manufacturer in the Senator's State might pour into a stream? Would the Federal Government have to make a grant-in-aid of removal from a stream of the pollution caused by the Senator's mill, for instance?

Mr. DANAHER. Yes, Mr. President, or by any person. The bill does not have in it the element of compulsion, as the Senator understands; but on page 5 of the bill, line 9, we find in section 6 this language:

> Such grants-in-aid or loans shall be made upon such terms and conditions as the President upon the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Then it would mean, for instance—if I may be pardoned for alluding to the Senator's mill—that if the Senator's mill should pour pollution into a stream, he could then apply to the Federal Government for a grant to help remove the pollution, and if the President should approve of that grant it would be made, and the Federal Treasury would be called upon to appropriate money for the purpose of aiding in the removal of the pollution?

Mr. DANAHER. Not only that, Mr. President; but if my mill has not yet begun to cause any pollution, if I am merely going to build a mill which may cause pollution, I may apply, even in advance of building the mill, for a grant-in-aid to eliminate the pollution which my mill will cause if I have one.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. DANAHER. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; but, of course, the Senator agrees that there is no compulsion to make the loans. The bill simply provides that these municipalities and persons shall be eligible.

Mr. DANAHER. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. And, if a loan is made, it is to be made according to the terms fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury. I am sure, however, that the Senator from Connecticut, as well as the Senator from Utah, realize that there are many concerns as well as municipalities in the country which did not start out for the purpose of polluting streams or destroying life or injuring health, but, as a matter of fact, they have done it. They have done it because of the character of the products which they turn out.

This is not primarily a bill to help a city from a financial standpoint, or to help a person or a corporation from a financial standpoint. This is a public-health measure. It is based upon the theory that there may be many such communities, municipal and otherwise, and many such persons, including corporations, that are not financially able to install the necessary devices or plants or purification machinery to protect the public from the consumption of polluted water. In such cases it is the theory of the bill that the public health and the public welfare are so intimately involved that the Government of the United States, after investigating each particular case on its merits, would be justified in advancing money for this purpose, not for the benefit of the corporation or the city but for the benefit of the public in the community. It is purely upon that basis that loans and grants-in-aid are provided for.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, the explanation offered by the Senator from Kentucky is adequate insofar as it goes. I quite realize that the mere fact that there is a bill on the calendar and that there will be approval by the Secretary of the Treasury, does not mean that the individual or corporation will get the money, for there still will have to be an appropriation. It is stated in the bill that the grants-in-aid shall be made upon such terms and conditions as the President shall provide. In his memorandum of disapproval of last year's bill the President stated:

> This bill provides for the legislative assumption of responsibilities of the executive branch, and, therefore, runs counter to the fundamental concept of our budget system that the planning of work programs of the executive agencies and their presentation to Congress in the form of estimates of appropriation is a duty imposed upon the Chief Executive and not one for exercise by the legislative branch.

If we have reached the point where the funds to be allocated are not to be under the control of the legislative branch with reference to their relation to the Budget as a whole, it seems to me that it is well nigh time that we looked further into the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator realizes that the President's fundamental objection was that the appropriations authorized in the bill did not have to go through the Budget Bureau, as all other estimates have to go through the Budget Bureau. That has been corrected, because under the bill as now drawn they must go through the Bureau of the Budget and a Budget estimate is required. That was a technical objection, of which I make no complaint, and I have, of course, accepted the attitude of the President and have attempted to correct the defect. But that does not go to the fundamental question, because the President made no objection to the appropriation. He did not veto the bill because it authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to make loans and grants under certain conditions when investigations justified them. He objected merely because of the route the appropriation would take after it was recommended.

Mr. DANAHER. Does not the Senator apprehend that when the President says the duty is imposed upon the Chief Executive and is not one for exercise by the legislative branch, he indicates the extent to which the planning of these additional programs should be approved?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the President was referring to the Budget law, which requires that all estimates shall come from the Bureau of the Budget, and that primarily, of course, it is an executive function to estimate through the Budget properly the amounts which will be appropriated for any purpose by the Congress. I think that is the proper interpretation of the President's language.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I send to the desk a copy of the President's memorandum of disapproval of the bill last year, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM OF DISAPPROVAL

I have withheld my approval of H. R. 2711, "An act to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes."

This bill authorizes the appropriation of $300,000 for administrative expenses of the Division of Water Pollution Control, $700,000 for expenditures by State health authorities for the preparation of project requests, and in addition, such amounts as may be necessary for loans and grants-in-aid of States, municipalities, public bodies, or individuals to carry out projects for treatment works to prevent water pollution.

I appreciate the importance of the results sought to be accomplished by the legislation, and I fully approved the establishment of a Division of Water Pollution Control in the Public Health Service. This bill, however, provides for the direct presentation, through the Secretary of the Treasury, of the recommendations of the Surgeon General for the authorization by Congress of specific projects to be carried on under the loan or grant-in-aid provisions of the bill, without any opportunity for review by the Chief Executive.

Thus this bill provides for the legislative assumption of responsibilities of the executive branch, and, therefore, runs counter to the fundamental concept of our budget system that the planning of work programs of the executive agencies and their presentation to Congress in the form of estimates of appropriation is a duty imposed upon the Chief Executive and not one for exercise by the legislative branch.

I am convinced that appropriations for projects of this character should be based upon estimates submitted in the annual Budget. Only in this way can the merit of such projects be considered in their proper relation to the merits of other projects of a similar nature, and all of these projects be then considered in their relation to the needs of the other Government activities that are presented for incorporation in the annual Budgets.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 25, 1938.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, the further objection to this grant-in-aid provision arises from another feature which seems to me worthy of the attention of the Senate.

The National Resources Board, to which the President referred in his message to the Congress on February 16, 1939, estimates that there can be no quick and easy solution of these problems, and that the cost will be approximately $2,000,000,000. That, of course, covers a period of from 10 to 20 years.

There is nothing to indicate what projects are to be recognized as of prime importance, and there is nothing to indicate—quite the contrary—that the one the Senator and I might think was most pressing would not even be approved at all.

On page 8 of the bill we find provision that the Board shall recommend the order of sequence of priority. For instance, it is estimated that more than 1,000,000,000 gallons of sewage are deposited into the navigable waters about New York City every day. That means that more than a million tons of solids are deposited in the waters of New York Harbor and environs of New York City every day, and the United States Government today is cleaning it out, dredging the harbor all the time. If the Government has the power and the right to undertake to control the navigable waters of the United States, and such a constant menace to health as has been referred to has been in existence all these years, it would seem to me that we might very properly ask ourselves just exactly where to go with this program.

I believe that the proper way to approach it is for the lower riparian owner in any given State, who is on a stream which is being polluted by an upper owner, to bring suit and avail himself of his remedy in court. The law courts exist, and adequate remedies are provided.

The State of New Jersey was sued by the State of New York in the United States Supreme Court about 20 years ago, and the United States of America intervened in the case, and, as a result, there was constructed at Passaic an intercepting sewer which ran all down the east coast of New Jersey to divert sewage from the navigable waters of the United States.

The State of Kentucky has a remedy against the State of Pennsylvania. The State of Ohio has a remedy against the State of Pennsylvania. There is no question in the world that the lower riparian owner, if someone is constantly committing a nuisance, has the right to have the nuisance abated in the courts of our land, without asking the United States Government to contribute in any sense toward the removal of the pollution which is put into the waters by the States themselves.

In the report of the committee on the bill, submitted by the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], we find this statement, and perhaps it is revealing:

> At a time when the Federal Government is spending, it is well to encourage legislation which will direct this spending along wise and useful lines.

That, I take it, Mr. President, is the keynote of the attempt to inject the United States Treasury into the grant-in-aid provision for removing pollution in States when the States themselves cause the pollution. I believe the amendments, every one of which is directed, as already reported, to the removal of the grant-in-aid feature, ought to prevail. I believe that creating a central division for a clearing house of information in the United States Public Health Service is an admirable provision, and there will be available under the bill a mililon dollars a year, approximately, for the purposes of ascertainment of the extent and plans and scope of the project thereafter. I believe that this new division, once we create it, can bring in next year an outline of its plan and what it wants to do. It can thereupon ask the Congress appropriately to direct its attention, rather than leave to Budget control, if you choose, to the Executive if you choose, the decision in relation to the whole amount of the appropriations for the coming year, and the projects which we will approve, and thereafter we will have something to say as to where the money is to go, and whether by way of grants-in-aid, or otherwise.

Mr. BARKLEY. Just a word, Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Connecticut.

Of course, if every community in the United States and every industry in the United States had on hand a surplus amount of money in their treasuries sufficient to enable them to do all these things, I would not insist that there be any provision for a loan or grant to any of them. But certainly there is no more worthy purpose for which the Federal Government could lend its money, which is to be paid back, except as far as the grants are concerned, than to protect and provide for the health of the American people. The people on the various streams are helpless insofar as controlling the flow of water is concerned. The people in Louisville, or Cincinnati, or Cairo, Ill., or Huntington, W. Va., have no power to control what occurs to the water above them. They have no power to control the floods which sweep down on them. Yet the Federal Government is undertaking to protect them against the floods, and they have just as little power to control the pollution which goes into the streams above those cities as they have to control the floods.

If they need assistance, not only in protecting themselves from what comes from above, but to protect those below from what they innocently do, if they need help, certainly it is a modest provision that not more than 33⅓ percent of the cost of the entire project shall be contributed by the Government of the United States.

Extending the assistance may mean the difference between being able to do the job and not to do it, and it will always be within the control of Congress. Only Congress appropriates the money.

This is merely an authorization. I know it is stated that when an authorization is made, it is usually followed by an appropriation. But we have a pretty alert and active watchdog of the Treasury in the Committee on Appropriations of the United States Senate, and unless that committee recommends an appropriation, or the Senate overrules it if it does not recommend an appropriation, to carry out the provisions of the proposed legislation, there would never be any assistance rendered cities, States, counties, or industries. Inasmuch as the amount available is always within the control of Congress, and inasmuch as there are many communities which can never even begin a purification program unless they receive assistance, it seems to me that there is no more worthy object toward which we might make loans and grants than in enabling our people to protect themselves against the insidious impurities of which they have no knowledge, and which can only be discovered after the people have contracted some disease and have called in a physician, or until the health authorities in the communities have condemned the water which the people are consuming.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Of course, the Senator must be aware of the fact that I am deeply sympathetic with the objective he seeks. I am.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes, I know; but the Senator is not willing to authorize this modest appropriation to help bring it about.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, as a matter of principle, is it not the fact and is it not the law that the State of Kentucky, if we choose to take that State, to which the Senator has adverted, has a right of action in the United States Supreme Court against an up-river State which is polluting a river?

Mr. BARKLEY. I should not like to pass categorically upon that question with a curbstone opinion. I am not certain that the State of Kentucky or the State of Missouri can bring suit against the State of Pennsylvania, for instance, because some coal operator in the State of Pennsylvania has allowed some deleterious matter to run into a nonnavigable stream, which finally runs into the Monongahela, and from the Monongahela into the Ohio, and then finally down into the Mississippi.

Mr. DANAHER. It therefore necessarily brings us to this ultimate point in logic, that if what is provided by the bill is voluntary, if there be no compulsory feature, stream pollution cannot be eliminated anyway.

Mr. BARKLEY. We can at least try the cooperative method; we can at least try the spirit of cooperation, both from an official and sanitary standpoint, as well as from the standpoint of finance. We can at least start out by making an effort to bring to communities the assistance of the Federal Government in the matter of investigation, and the influence of its great health department upon the local communities to help clarify these situations. Not only that, but we can make a modest effort to help them financially to carry out whatever plan they may ultimately agree upon.

For that reason I hope that the amendment of the Senator will be disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll and was interrupted by——

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and the order for the roll call is rescinded.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri obtained the floor.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I should like to offer, if it is in order to do so now, before the Senator from Missouri offers a substitute for the bill.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has agreed to accept my amendment. I have also taken the liberty of speaking to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who would have no objection to accepting my amendment if his amendment in the nature of a substitute should be agreed to.

I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 18, after "Sec. 3", it is proposed to insert "(a)"; and on page 3, after line 25, it is proposed to insert the following new subsection, as follows:

(b) The Division, upon the request of any municipality, shall make a periodic test of the water at any bathing beach within the limits of such municipality, and shall make a report to such municipality as promptly as possible with respect to the existence of water pollution at such bathing beach and shall make definite recommendations for the correction and elimination of any deleterious conditions which are found to exist.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert certain language, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

There is hereby created in the Army Engineer Corps a Division of Water Pollution Control (hereinafter referred to as the Division). The Division shall be in charge of a commissioned officer in the Army Engineer Corps detailed by the Chief of Engineers, whose duties it shall be to administer the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. (a) The Division shall, after careful investigation and in cooperation with the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, the Chief of the United States Biological Survey, the Commissioner of Fisheries, and the Chief of the United States Forest Service, which four shall constitute an advisory committee, perform the duties imposed upon it by this act and shall make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for carrying out its provisions.

(b) The Division is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, and to make such expenditures, as may be necessary for carrying out its functions under this act.

(c) The Division shall make a full report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session of the administration of the functions with which it is charged.

COOPERATION WITH STATE AGENCIES

SEC. 3. (a) The Division shall cooperate with agencies of the several States authorized or designated by State law to deal with water pollution with a view to—

(1) Coordinating the activities of the several States relating to the prevention and abatement of water pollution;

(2) Encouraging the enactment of uniform State laws relating to water pollution;

(3) Encouraging compacts between the several States for the prevention and abatement of water pollution; and

(4) Making such studies, surveys, and experiments as may be necessary to determine the need for, and to devise methods for carrying out, preventive and corrective measures relating to water pollution in the several States.

(b) For the purposes of this section the Division is authorized—

(1) To make available to State agencies the results of such surveys, studies, and experiments conducted by it and by other agencies, public and private;

(2) To collect and disseminate information with reference to water pollution and its prevention and correction;

(3) To assign experts in its employ, or, with the approval of the head of the department or agency concerned, in the employ of any other department or agency of the Government, to assist and advise State agencies without charge to such State agencies;

(4) To recommend or arrange loans for the construction of sewage-disposal plants or works for the treatment of trade wastes, as hereinafter provided; and

(5) To furnish such other assistance to State agencies as may be authorized by law.

INTERSTATE COMPACTS

SEC. 4. The consent of Congress is hereby given to two or more States to enter into agreements or compacts, not in conflict with any law of the United States, for cooperative effort and mutual assistance for the prevention and abatement of water pollution and the enforcement of their respective laws relating thereto, and to establish such agencies, joint or otherwise, as they may deem desirable for making effective such agreements and compacts.

STUDIES AND SURVEYS

SEC. 5. The Division shall make or cause to be made such studies, surveys, and experiments relating to water pollution and its prevention and abatement as it deems necessary. Insofar as practicable in making such studies, surveys, and experiments the Division shall make use of information gained from any similar studies, surveys, or experiments which are available to the Division and, with the consent of the head of the department or agency concerned, shall designate employees of any other department or agency of the United States to perform functions in connection therewith.

ESTABLISHMENT OF SANITARY WATER DISTRICTS

SEC. 6. (a) As soon as practicable, the Division shall classify the navigable waters of the continental United States into districts to be known as sanitary water districts. The Division shall fix and define the boundaries of each such district and may from time to time alter such boundaries. The areas of such districts shall, insofar as practicable, conform to the areas of watersheds not wholly contained within the boundaries of one State.

(b) The Division shall fix standards of purity in each such district for the navigable waters thereof; shall establish minimum requirements as to the treatment of polluting material before it is discharged into such waters; and shall promulgate regulations governing the discharge of any matter or materials directly or indirectly into such waters.

DISTRICT BOARDS

SEC. 7. (a) In each sanitary water district there shall be a district board. The number of members of each such board, and the method of selection or appointment and terms of office shall be fixed by the Division in its discretion except that there shall be at least one representative from State health departments or other State agencies charged wih control of pollution, State fish and game agencies, State departments of agriculture and State departments of labor embraced within the district, and one representative of industry and one representative of municipalities on the board: Provided further, That all members of the district board shall be bona fide residents of the district. Each district board shall have not less than 5 nor more than 21 members: Provided further, That wherever any two or more States have heretofore or may hereafter enter into any compact for the prevention or abatement of stream pollution and providing an agency to enforce the provisions of the compact, said agency shall be designated the district board of that particular watershed.

(b) It shall be the duty of each district board—

(1) To prevent by voluntary methods insofar as practicable the pollution of waters within the district;

(2) To investigate the desirability of making loans or grants in such districts for the construction of sewage-disposal plants and works for the treatment of trade and municipal wastes and to recommend the making of such loans or grants to the Division; and

(3) To institute proceedings for the prevention and abatement of water pollution in such district: Provided, That where a duly constituted State agency or interstate compact with authority to enforce the provisions of this act is in existence that action by the district board will be taken only after such existing authorities have been given an opportunity to act and, after due notice, have failed to do so.

LOANS AND GRANTS

SEC. 8. The Division is authorized to make loans or grants, or both, to States and political subdivisions and municipalities thereof, and to make loans to persons or corporations for the construction, enlargement, or improvement of sewage-disposal plants and plants or works for the treatment of trade wastes, subject to review and approval by the President or other overlying agency authorized by Congress. Such loans and grants shall be made upon such terms and conditions as the Division shall prescribe, subject to the following limitations:

(1) Loans or grants shall be made only upon the request or recommendation of a State agency or the district board of a sanitary water district.

(2) No grant shall be made in respect to any project of an amount in excess of 50 percent of the reasonable cost of such project.

INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS FOR THE ABATEMENT OF POLLUTION

SEC. 9. Pursuant to the powers of the United States to regulate interstate commerce and navigation; to extend, change, and amend the admiralty and maritime law; to give due effect to the migratory bird treaties; and to protect the fisheries, including the anadromous fish, Congress hereby declares the discharge or deposit, directly or indirectly, of any waste, except the normal discharge of sewage from toilets of boats or from the galley sink drains or the normal amount of oil that may be discharged from the exhaust pipe of a motorboat, or other substance, whether in a solid, gaseous, or liquid state, into any of the navigable waters of the United States, in violation of regulations promulgated by the Division, if such waste or other substance is or may be injurious to human health or to any form of life, including aquatic life, or to migratory birds as defined in the migratory bird treaty of August 16, 1916, and , 1937, or impairs in any manner the utility of such waters for navigation purposes, to be against the public policy of the United States and to be a public and common nuisance. An action to prevent or abate any such nuisance may be brought in the name of the United States by any United States attorney, and it shall be the duty of such attorneys to bring such an action when requested to do so by the Division or the district board of a sanitary water district: Provided, That when a duly constituted State agency or interstate compact with authority to enforce the provisions of this act is in existence, action by the Federal authority will be taken only after such existing authorities have been given an opportunity to act and, after due notice, have failed to do so. Such action shall be brought as an action in equity and may be brought in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear and determine equity cases.

MISCELLANEOUS

SEC. 10. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed to limit in any manner the rights of any person or public body to bring actions for damages on account of the pollution of any waters or for the abatement of such pollution.

SEC. 11. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions and purposes of this act, not to exceed $1,000,000 per annum.

SEC. 12. All provisions of this act applicable to the States shall also be applicable to the District of Columbia.

SEC. 13. This act may be cited as the Water Pollution Act.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, the difference between the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and the bill introduced by myself is simply the difference between making a gesture at the eradication of stream pollution and the actual accomplishment of that purpose.

One of the most remarkable proposals in all the history of the United States is now presented by the bill of the Senator from Kentucky in its present form, because it provides for putting the question of the eradication of stream pollution, which is essentially an engineering project, under the Social Security Board. In view of the President's recent order putting the Public Health Service under the Social Security Board, if the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky becomes a law we may look forward to having one of the long-haired social workers from the Social Security Board go out to pass upon the engineering problem of the eradication of stream pollution in the navigable streams of the United States.

Mr. President, everything that has been done in this country—and it has been done with limited authority—in the direction of stream-pollution control has been done by the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army. The theory of imposing this responsibility and authority on the Corps of Engineers is that the control of our navigable streams, for purposes of navigation, power, and flood control, has been increasingly recognized during the years as a Federal problem. If the control of our navigable streams for flood-control purposes and for navigation purposes is a Federal problem, it would seem to follow inevitably that the responsibility for freeing those streams from pollution, both for the health of the people in the communities along the banks of those streams and for the preservation and restoration of our natural wildlife, is also a Federal problem.

The bill which I have introduced as a substitute proceeds upon that theory. It does not provide for having an authority set up to go around and slap people on the wrist and urge them to cease polluting streams to the danger of health, life, and property. It sets up machinery by which every effort will be made by the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, which is charged with responsibility for the management of those streams at the present time, to bring about the abolition of the condition. However, when a small percentage of industrial concerns or municipalities refuse to cooperate in the general effort to cleanse the streams, the bill vests in that authority the assertion of a Federal right to go into a court of competent jurisdiction and declare such practices a nuisance.

Mr. President, I am perfectly frank to say that it seems to me it would be better for no bill at all to pass than to have the bill proposed by the Senator from Kentucky enacted into law, deluding the people of the United States for a longer period into the belief that something has been accomplished, when as a matter of fact the very text of the bill itself shows that nothing would be accomplished. We should be delaying action for an additional period of years, and spending in the futile gesture of wrist slapping more money than would be expended under the measure which I propose for full authority to enforce the law and eradicate the condition.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter from the Acting Secretary of War upon the subject of the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GREEN in the chair). Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 31, 1939.

In reply refer to E. D.
7235-997.

Hon. JOSIAH W. BAILEY,
Chairman, Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR BAILEY: The Department acknowledges your letter of January 19, 1939, referring for the views of the Department S. 685, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes.

The bill provides for the creation of a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service to make investigations in cooperation with other Federal agencies, and authorized State agencies, and prepare a comprehensive plan for eliminating or reducing the pollution and improving the sanitary condition of the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto. It contains other provisions necessary to carry out the purposes of the bill and authorizes annual appropriations beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, for administration expenses and for expenditures necessary in the promotion, investigation, surveys, and studies in the prevention and control of water pollution. It also provides that States, municipalities, or other public bodies discharging untreated or inadequately treated sewage or wastes into navigable waters of the United States or streams tributary thereto, and any person discharging, or building works which will discharge untreated or inadequately treated sewage or waste, are declared eligible for Federal aid in the construction of necessary treatment works, in accordance with plans approved by the respective State Health Authority and the Surgeon General.

The bill is essentially similar to H. R. 2711, Seventy-fifth Congress, first session. In its report on that bill the Department pointed out that the enactment of general legislation for the control of water pollution might well be deferred until a comprehensive survey had been completed of a major stream in which pollution conditions are acute so that a considered plan for the control and abatement of pollution might be based upon the detailed information with respect to existing conditions developed in such a survey.

Congress, in the River and Harbor Act approved August 26, 1937, authorized and directed the Secretary of War to make such a survey of the Ohio River and its tributaries. It further directed that the survey be completed as soon as practicable after the passage of that act, and that the Secretary of War report the results thereof to Congress, together with such recommendations for remedial legislation as he deems advisable.

In the prosecution of investigations and works of improvement of rivers, harbors, and other waterways, and for flood control and allied purposes, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, the Department operates through 45 districts, the boundaries of which conform to watersheds, and cover the continental United States. This organization now administers the provisions of the Oil Pollution Act of 1924, which prohibits the discharge of oil from vessels into the coastal navigable waters of the United States, and section 13 of the River and Harbor Act approved March 3, 1899, which prohibits the discharge or deposit of any refuse matter of any kind or description other than that flowing from streets or sewers in a liquid state into any navigable water of the United States or into any tributary of any navigable water. Through this organization the Department has investigated and reported to Congress the extent of pollution of navigable and nonnavigable waters of the United States which endanger or interfere with navigation or commerce or fisheries, and, as a result of a recent survey, the number and description of Federal institutions and establishments depositing raw untreated sewage into such waters. As stated above, it is now engaged in a pollution study of the Ohio River.

The Department desires to point out that the proposed legislation would assign certain of these functions to another Department. Whether this is deemed necessary at this time and whether the enactment of any further Federal legislation is desirable prior to the receipt of the report and recommendations of the Secretary of War as called for in the act of Congress approved August 26, 1937, are left to the wisdom of Congress.

This proposed report was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, which advises that S. 685 would not be, but that H. R. 4314 would be, in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS JOHNSON,
Acting Secretary of War.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, so far as the recommendations of the Bureau of the Budget are concerned, the bill now pending before the Senate—Senate bill 685—and the substitute I have offered are on exactly the same footing. Both have been disapproved by the Bureau of the Budget. The substitute, however, contains an absolute limit on the authorization of appropriations, while the measure introduced by the Senator from Kentucky contains, on top of the authorization for appropriations, the authorization of a system of loans and grants which may run into an incalculable sum.

The difference between the two bills may be further amplified by the statement that the substitute provides for the exercise of the authority of the United States Government through courts of competent jurisdiction for the purpose of preventing these common nuisances, while the bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky consists of a proposal to establish loans and grants to pay persons not to commit nuisances on the navigable streams of the United States.

I repeat that I believe the passage of the measure of the Senator from Kentucky would delay the solution of this problem rather than hasten it, while in the meantime costing the people of the United States very large sums of money not fully set out in the terms of the bill.

Mr. President, the Committee on Commerce, in considering these bills, heard the testimony of Colonel Lee, of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, who unquestionably has done more than any other man or combination of men in the United States for the eradication of stream pollution. Formerly he was assigned to the Delaware River district, in Pennsylvania and Delaware. He now is assigned to an almost equally important area on the Pacific coast. In the Delaware and Schuylkill Valleys, partly by negotiation, partly by argument, and partly by the threat of using section 13 of the River and Harbor Act of 1899 and the provision of the Oil Pollution Act of 1924, Colonel Lee brought about a substantial cooperation on the part of nearly all the industrial agencies which were polluting the streams in those two valleys.

In the case of the Schuylkill, what was formerly one of the most beautiful rivers in the United States, it had been practically ruined by mine discharges and discharges from industrial plants. In that instance Colonel Lee was able to bring about very substantial reforms by the mere threat of using the provisions of these two Federal acts, neither one of which was sufficiently explicit to give him any great means of coercion.

The substitute merely provides for giving the authority set up against stream pollution some power to act against the small proportion of industrial concerns or municipalities or mine owners who are not willing to cooperate to eradicate this condition.

Another thing is very much to be considered in determining the question of what bureau of the Government should exercise this authority. The Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, of course, is thoroughly familiar with all the conditions having to do with the navigable rivers and harbors of the United States. They are a corps of technicians who understand engineering problems. It has been demonstrated that the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army have been able very much to hasten and facilitate the cooperation of mine owners and industrial plants by putting at their disposal the services of one of the finest technical branches of the Government. In most cases it has been demonstrated that utilization of the services of this fine corps of technicians has enabled the persons who have been polluting the streams to handle the disposal of waste without loss, and in many cases at an absolute profit. The Corps of Engineers treated the problem as an engineering one; and to say that such results could be attained by turning over to the Social Security Board, forsooth, the solution of this very important problem, seems to me to be one of the most ridiculous propositions ever presented to Congress.

Mr. Altmeyer is a fine man. On social-security problems I have the greatest respect for his opinion and his recommendations. But to talk about turning over to the Social Security Board, which is now the superior of the Public Health Service, the enforcement and administration of an effort to eliminate stream pollution in the United States seems to me to be absolutely preposterous.

Therefore, Mr. President, I repeat that in my opinion it would be better to enact no bill at all than to enact a bill spending a great deal of money without any means of enforcement, without any machinery set up actually to accomplish any tangible results.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator states that we are to spend a great deal of money. Does not the Senator understand that the bill, as introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, does not contemplate spending any money until the Congress appropriates it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, of course that is true of any bill. Certainly the Committee on Commerce, which reported the pending bill, would have no authority whatever to report an appropriation. Nobody contends that they would. Nevertheless, the bill is an authorization for the appropriation of a great deal of money; and it means setting our feet into a path which must inevitably lead to the expenditure of an unlimited sum of money.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. Does the Senator realize that the National Resources Committee, upon which the President's message to us in February was based, estimates an annual cost of $225,000,000 for mine and engineering wastes alone? Did the Senator see that figure?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I must confess that I have not been particularly familiar with the activities of that unofficial governmental agency. I am not familiar with any act of Congress setting up such a governmental agency, and I am not particularly familiar with their reports.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Missouri for his comment. I merely wish to direct his attention to the statement of a Senator who spoke earlier, and who indicated that the huge sum of money to which the Senator has referred might never be spent, at least not in the way that was indicated by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would be willing to vote for and to advocate a very liberal appropriation, as a matter of fact one much more liberal than that authorized in my own bill, if a measure could be passed which would accomplish the purpose for which both of these measures are ostensibly designed. My objection to the bill of the Senator from Kentucky is that under it an unnamed sum of money would be spent, which would not accomplish, and would not hold out any real hope of accomplishing the purpose desired. If it would accomplish the purpose I would be willing to vote to spend a very large sum of money in the interest of the preservation of the health and the natural resources of the Nation.

Mr. President, I do not desire unduly to delay the Senate. I stated to the Senator from Kentucky that I did not desire to detain the Senate on this matter; but, in view of the importance of the measure, I think we should have a quorum to vote on the proposal when the vote is taken.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, of course I desire to reply briefly to the Senator from Missouri on the substitute, but I do not wish to keep the Senate in session later than Senators desire to remain. I have no objection to the matter going over.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator from Kentucky, and ask him if it is agreeable. So far as I am concerned, I have no desire whatever to delay a vote. I would be perfectly willing to have the Senator from Kentucky occupy such time of the Senate as he desires to, and then to enter into any sort of an agreement whatever as to when a vote shall be taken. I should like to have a quorum when a vote is taken.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no objection to the Senator having a quorum called; but if the matter is to go over, I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate this afternoon, and I would rather wait until we resume consideration of the bill at a later time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no desire to delay a vote, but I should like to have a quorum present.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, before an adjournment is taken, I have a conference report I should like to have acted on.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am going to make it possible for the Senator to bring that up, if the Senator will permit.

Under the circumstances I have no desire to keep the Senate in session any later, and inasmuch as the calendar is pretty well cleaned up and there is nothing of any great importance looming up for consideration on Monday, I am disposed to let the pending matter go over until Monday.

In view of these circumstances, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock on Monday next, and that in the meantime the Vice President be authorized to sign bills and resolutions ready for his signature, that committees be authorized to make reports on bills, resolutions, or nominations, and that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to receive messages from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I desire to speak on the pending bill, but I will defer my remarks until Monday.

SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. ADAMS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5219) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1939, and June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 10.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 11, 13, 15, 16, 18, 21, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, and 50, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,186,195"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$10,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$450,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference report in disagreement amendments numbered 12, 17, 19, and 20.

The report was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its action on certain amendments of the Senate to House bill 5219, which was read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 27, 1939.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 17, 19, and 20 to the bill (H. R. 5219) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1939, and June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, and concur therein; and

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12 to said bill and concur therein with the following amendments:

In line 22 of the matter inserted by said Senate engrossed amendment, strike out all after "$100:" down to and including "thereof:" in line 26; and in such matter strike out the respective proposed sums of "$600,000", "$120,000", and "$480,000" and insert in lieu thereof, respectively, the sums "$120,000", "$24,000", and "$96,000".

Mr. ADAMS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GREEN in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on Commerce, reported favorably the nomination of Edward P. Warner, of Connecticut, to be a member of the Civil Aeronautics Authority for the remainder of the term expiring December 31, 1940, vice Edward J. Noble.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the calendar.

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alexander W. Weddell, of Virginia, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Spain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday, under the order previously entered.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until Monday, May 1, 1939, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 27, 1939

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Harcourt Alexander Morgan, of Tennessee, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority for the term expiring 9 years after May 18, 1939. (Reappointment.)

UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE

Harry J. Lemley, of Arkansas, to be United States district judge for the eastern and western districts of Arkansas, to fill a position created by the act of Congress of May 31, 1938.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

Joseph T. Votava, of Nebraska, to be United States attorney for the district of Nebraska. (Mr. Votava is now serving in this office under an appointment which expired April 5, 1939.)

APPOINTMENTS IN THE REGULAR ARMY

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Clarence H. Corkran, pastor of Douglas Memorial Methodist Church, offered the following prayer:

O Thou that doth inhabit eternity, our Father and our God, we pause at this moment to give Thee thanks for all the blessings which Thou hast so richly bestowed upon us in the past and to invoke Thy favor this day. Be Thou with us as we take up the duties of a new day. Let Thy wisdom and understanding fill our hearts and minds. Be Thou our constant guide and inspiration. Make known to us the full force of Thy rule of life—the Golden Rule—and enable us to practice it fully. Give direction; give assurance; and, above all, an abiding faith, so that in the hour of defeat, as well as in the hour of victory, we may be steadfast in our allegiance to Him who is the Saviour of the world. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 4133. An act for the relief of Joseph N. Thiele.

SUNDRY MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

On April 20, 1939:

H. R. 136. An act to authorize contingent expenditures, United States Coast Guard Academy;

H. R. 534. An act for the relief of Hallie H. Woods;

H. R. 590. An act for the relief of Macey N. Bevan;

H. R. 2056. An act for the relief of the Shipowners & Merchants Towboat Co., Ltd.;

H. R. 2064. An act for the relief of Allen L. Abshier, Verne G. Adams, Oliver D. Chattin, William K. Heath, and Harry B. Jennings;

H. R. 2595. An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of the Mack Copper Co.;

H. R. 3946. An act to authorize the attendance of the Marine Band at the United Confederate Veterans' 1939 Reunion at Trinidad, Colo., August 22, 23, 24, and 25, 1939, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 224. Joint resolution to authorize the painting of the signing of the Constitution for placement in the Capitol Building.

On April 24, 1939:

H. R. 3655. An act to amend the act entitled "An act for the grading and classification of clerks in the Foreign Service of the United States of America, and providing compensation therefor," approved February 23, 1931.

On April 25, 1939:

H. R. 4278. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes.

On April 26, 1939:

H. R. 899. An act to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station on the east coast of the Keweenaw Peninsula, Mich.;

H. R. 1661. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Mahoning River at or near Marshall Street, Youngstown, Ohio;

H. R. 1776. An act to provide for the assignment of medical officers of the Public Health Service for duty on vessels of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and for other purposes;

H. R. 1962. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Mahoning River at or near Cedar Street, Youngstown, Ohio;

H. R. 2073. An act to allow credit in the accounts of certain former disbursing officers of the Veterans' Administration, and for other purposes;

H. R. 2635. An act granting the consent of Congress to Westmoreland County, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway intercounty bridge and approaches across the Allegheny River connecting Valley Camp in Westmoreland County and East Deer Township in Allegheny County, to connect State Highway Routes Nos. 28 and 56;

H. R. 2661. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N. Y.;

H. R. 3225. An act authorizing the Department of Highways of the State of Ohio to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Ottawa River at or near the city of Toledo, State of Ohio;

H. R. 3234. An act to provide for the completion of the Navy and Marine Memorial;

H. R. 3418. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Highway Department of Davidson County, of the State of Tennessee, to construct a bridge across Cumberland River, at a point approximately 1¾ miles below Clees Ferry, connecting a belt-line highway in Davidson County, State of Tennessee, known as the Old Hickory Boulevard;

H. R. 3589. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State Highway Commission of North Carolina to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across Waccamaw River between Old Dock and Ash, N. C.;

H. R. 4243. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Indiana to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Wabash River at or near Peru, Ind.;

H. R. 4432. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Warren, Ohio, to construct, maintain, and operate a free footbridge over Mahoning River near Stiles Street NW., Warren, Ohio;

H. R. 4527. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Rock Island, Ill., to a place at or near the city of Davenport, Iowa;

H. R. 4630. An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 4830. An act to amend the act approved April 27, 1937, entitled "An act to simplify accounting."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MICHAEL J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein some remarks made by Monsignor Robert F. Keegan at the White House conference on children.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURLEY] may have permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Under the practice of the House, the Chair will recognize a request by the gentleman from Ohio to proceed for 1 minute.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio to address the House for 1 minute?

There was no objection.

REPRESENTATIVE ROBERT CROSSER

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion to call to the attention of the House of Representatives the fact that this year 1939 marks the twenty-fifth anniversary of public service as a Member of Congress of the United States of our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Ohio, the Honorable ROBERT CROSSER. I am sure I voice the sentiments of the membership of this body on both sides of the aisle when I publicly extend to him and in your name the congratulations of this entire body. [Applause.]

Few men enjoy the privilege of serving a quarter of a century in the Congress of the United States. During all these years our friend has demonstrated that he is a firm believer in democracy in all the true sense of the word. He has been a champion of the rights of labor and he has been publicly acclaimed by many of his admirers throughout the Nation as a "friend of man."

I pay to ROBERT CROSSER this personal tribute, based upon my acquaintance with him for many, many years and my association with him for the past 8 years as a colleague in the Congress of the United States. I never knew an individual who excelled him in his liberalism, his philosophy of life, and his deep concern for the welfare of his country and his fellow men.

Mr. Speaker, to commemorate the silver jubilee of his services as a Member of Congress of the United States there gathered in the city of Cleveland in the evening of April 22 over 1,000 men and women to attend a testimonial banquet in honor of Mr. CROSSER. The toastmaster on this occasion was his lifelong friend, a veteran newspaperman of Cleveland, the distinguished and nationally known Jack Raper. The mayor of the city of Cleveland, the Honorable Harold Burton, paid to Mr. CROSSER this tribute:

He has outlived his critics. Today he is beyond criticism.

[Applause.]

The occasion was graced by the presence of the beloved majority leader of the House of Representatives, the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, who paid an extraordinary tribute to his friend and associate of many years in the Congress. The speaker for the railroad labor executive associations was Mr. D. B. Robertson, president, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen. He told of Mr. CROSSER'S sponsorship of legislation affecting the railroad workers of America. Congressman MICHAEL KIRWAN, Congressman CHESTER BOLTON, and Congressman GEORGE BENDER, all from Ohio, honored Mr. CROSSER by their presence; also honoring him were the former United States Senator from Ohio, Robert J. Bulkley; Judge Charles M. Hay, of St. Louis; and former Congressman Edward Keating, now editor of Labor.

Hundreds of telegrams and congratulatory messages came to Mr. CROSSER from all parts of the United States and Canada from those who were unable to be present. The President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Vice President of the United States, the senior Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, Congressman JOHN DINGELL, and Congressman CARL MAPES all sent messages expressing splendid tribute to Mr. CROSSER. I append herewith the messages referred to, together with the splendid tribute paid to Mr. CROSSER by Mr. D. B. Robertson, and also the tribute of the Honorable SAM RAYBURN.

Responding to the eulogies paid him, Mr. CROSSER delivered what is considered by many of his friends who were present one of the finest speeches ever delivered by him during his entire public career. So his many friends in Congress and throughout the Nation may have the opportunity to read this speech, I insert Mr. CROSSER'S response to the tributes of his friends, together with an editorial which appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer under date of April 24, 1939, paying tribute to ROBERT CROSSER. This editorial is unique and it comes from a newspaper which consistently, with few exceptions, fought Mr. CROSSER in every campaign in which he engaged for election as a Member of the House of Representatives. I also include an editorial from the Cleveland Press under date of April 21, 1939, paying a similar tribute to Mr. CROSSER.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT CROSSER, M. C.,
Cleveland, Ohio.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN CROSSER: I regret that I was unable to accept the invitation to attend in person the dinner to be given in Cleveland in your honor and in recognition of your completion of 25 years of public service as a Member of Congress.

Although I cannot be present it gives me great pleasure to be associated with those who are gathering in your honor. Your able and conscientious service has made lovers of the liberal cause your debtors and I wish for your long years of health and happiness.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE SPEAKER'S ROOM,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1939.

Mr. ROY C. SCOTT,
Committee Chairman,
Hotel Hollenden, Cleveland, Ohio.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received and most deeply appreciate your cordial invitation to attend the testimonial dinner to be given in honor of Representative CROSSER in Cleveland on Saturday afternoon, April 22 next. I very deeply regret that on account of my official duties here in Washington it will not be possible for me to attend.

Please allow me to say that I have been associated with BOB CROSSER for a great many years in the House of Representatives and I have seen hundreds of men come and go in and out of this body, but I can say with all candor and sincerity that I have never been associated with anyone in the House for whom I had a higher respect and admiration than Mr. CROSSER. He is a man of fine mental attainments, of incorruptible integrity, and has great influence with his associates.

He deserves everlasting praise from all labor organizations for the constant zeal and ability with which he has represented the interests of labor in the House of Representatives. I hold for him an abiding affection.

Wishing you a very fine occasion, and again expressing my deep regret that I cannot be with you, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

W. B. BANKHEAD.

THE VICE PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER,
Washington, April 3, 1939.

Mr. ROY C. SCOTT,
Committee Chairman, Robert Crosser Testimonial Dinner,
Cleveland, Ohio.

DEAR MR. SCOTT: I am grateful to you and your committee for the invitation extended me to attend the testimonial dinner in honor of Congressman ROBERT CROSSER, to be held in Cleveland the evening of April 22. I regret exceedingly that I cannot be with you.

I have had the privilege of association with Congressman CROSSER for a quarter of a century, the greater part of that time as his colleague in the House of Representatives. He is a big-brained, big-hearted American, who has served his district, State, and Nation efficiently and faithfully. It is a source of personal pleasure that his friends are tendering this deserved tribute of esteem and respect.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN N. GARNER.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE,
April 22, 1939.

Mr. ROY C. SCOTT,
Committee Chairman, Robert Crosser Testimonial Dinner,
The Hotel Hollenden, Cleveland, Ohio.

MY DEAR MR. SCOTT: I have before me your invitation to attend the testimonial dinner in honor of Congressman ROBERT CROSSER. I held off answering this letter, hoping that I might be able to attend, but I find it impossible, as my work is so heavy at this time that every minute is necessary.

In 1912 Congressman CROSSER and myself were members of the Fourth Ohio Constitutional Convention. It was my good luck to be his seat mate in this memorable convention, and this convention will probably be the last ever to be held in Ohio because the people now have an easy method of amending their constitution in the adoption of I. and R.

BOB CROSSER led, not only in this fight but in a great many progressive fights in behalf of the people as well. BOB CROSSER and I have been firm friends from the time we were seat mates until the present time. He is "just folks." He will tell you that to live with, serve, and love "folks" has been the greatest blessing in his life of public service. He will also tell you that "folks" will solve all public questions correctly if they understand them. Yes; and he will tell you that "mother, home, and country" is the sweetest trinity locked in the hearts of "just folks."

One of the most worth-while things in life is to make friends and deserve to keep them. I yield to no man in my love and respect for BOB CROSSER—a man with whom one dares to be himself.

To BOB CROSSER and his legion of friends surrounding him tonight, I extend sincere regards and best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

VIC DONAHEY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 22, 1939.

CHAIRMAN,
Testimonial Dinner to Hon. Robert Crosser,
Hotel Hollenden, Cleveland, Ohio:

Please extend my hearty congratulations to BOB CROSSER on his completion of 25 years of distinguished public service. He has been a faithful official and a loyal Democrat. I hope he carries on for at least another quarter of a century.

JAMES A. FARLEY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 22, 1939.

ROY C. SCOTT,
Active Chairman, Committee on Arrangements, Crosser Testimonial Dinner, Hollenden Hotel, Cleveland, Ohio:

I am disappointed indeed because of my inability to be with you on this occasion. To pay tribute publicly to my esteemed friend and colleague, BOB CROSSER, would have been in accordance with my plans and wishes. However, the people of Cleveland, and particularly those of BOB CROSSER's district, know him so well that anything which I might say could scarcely add any luster to his good name and accomplishments. Therefore, please tender to the honor guest an expression of my high regard and very best wishes, and may he serve his constituency for many years to come.

JOHN D. DINGELL,
Member of Congress.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 22, 1939.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Care Hotel Hollenden, Cleveland, Ohio:

I wish you would congratulate BOB CROSSER for me on the fine and deserved testimonial which his friends are giving him tonight. He has had a long and distinguished service in Congress. With you I have prized his friendship over the years and greatly admire him for his character and for what he is as well as for his record of patriotic unselfish and valuable public service.

CARL E. MAPES,
Member of Congress.

GALT, ONTARIO, April 22, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT CROSSER,
Hotel Hollenden, Cleveland, Ohio:

The voice of Bob, your fellow Scot Congressman from the Land o' the Leal, says carry on. Congratulations.

BILL BREMNER.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer of April 24, 1939]

HE KEEPS THE FAITH

The tribute which came to ROBERT CROSSER Saturday night was as unusual as it was merited.

It is not often that any Congressman finds conspicuous members of an opposing party at a gathering in his honor and hears them praise him and his work. It is uncommon, at least in the North, for a national legislator to complete a quarter century of service with reelection year after year as certain as time's march across the calendar, though he serves a State and city famed for its varying political trends.

The answer is that ROBERT CROSSER is an uncommon Congressman. Always he puts principles before personal interest. With Caledonian tenacity he sticks to his convictions, whether or not they are popular at the moment. A follower of the Tom L. Johnson brand of liberalism, he has kept the faith.

Often such a course has meant political oblivion. It is heartening to find, in CROSSER's case, that this is not always true. So it seems to us that along with the just praise of Congressman CROSSER there should also be a word of commendation for his constituents. They have not always agreed with him, but they recognize his worth and character. The matter is well stated by Republican Harold H. Burton, who says of Democrat ROBERT CROSSER, "he has outlived criticism and today is without critics * * * a man honored and trusted."

Cleveland honors itself in honoring the Representative from the Twenty-first.

[Editorial, Cleveland Press, April 21, 1939]

ACCOLADE FOR MR. CROSSER

It is a well-deserved tribute and one that is long overdue, which labor, politics, and civic Cleveland will unite to pay to Congressman ROBERT CROSSER tomorrow night.

Few Clevelanders have served their city, their State, and their Nation more conscientiously and with less ostentation than the dean of Ohio's congressional delegation.

A follower of Tom L. Johnson, Congressman CROSSER always has remained loyal to the ideals of Cleveland's great mayor. During his long public career he has championed causes that were unpopular at the time, but he has lived to see his course vindicated. Few legislators can point to so much worth-while legislation as the veteran Representative from the Twenty-first District.

Ohio owes its initiative and referendum to ROBERT CROSSER, who early in his political career was a member of the 1912 constitutional convention. Under this amendment voters can enact laws favored by a majority or repeal those which are obnoxious.

The railroad men of the Nation are indebted to him for a pension system. Scores of laws calculated to advance the best interest of the country are his handiwork.

The Congressional Directory lists the Cleveland Congressman as a Democrat. That does not describe him. He is independent in politics, independent in thought, and independent in deed, and his record proves it.

Not once since he went to Washington in 1913 has ROBERT CROSSER played to the gallery. Sturdy, reliable, and sure, the Scotchman from Lanarkshire who came to Cleveland in 1881 is an outstanding example of the highest type of public official.

He has well earned the public acclaim that he will receive tomorrow night, and we trust that he will be spared to represent the Twenty-first District and the Nation in the Halls of Congress for many years to come.

A RAILROAD MAN'S TRIBUTE TO ROBERT CROSSER—ADDRESS BY D. B. ROBERTSON, PRESIDENT, BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE FIREMEN AND ENGINEMEN, SPEAKING FOR THE RAILWAY LABOR EXECUTIVES' ASSOCIATION AT THE ROBERT CROSSER TESTIMONIAL DINNER, CLEVELAND, OHIO, APRIL 22, 1939

I am here tonight to bring to our honored guest, Congressman CROSSER, whom we prefer to call affectionately "BOB" CROSSER, the greetings of the railroad workers of America. In what I shall say I shall speak not only my own sentiments but, I am sure, the sentiments of railroad men wherever they may be found, whether riding engines and trains, laying rails, flashing signals, or working in offices or shops, or on leave or furlough, or numbered among the thousands let out of the service in recent years. These men, all of them, are here tonight in spirit and bid me say to you, Friend BOB:

"Here we are, more than a million strong, your admirers, your supporters, your comrades, and friends."

Railroad men have reason for their faith in and affection for BOB CROSSER. From his earliest years of public service we have known him to be our friend. He has all the while felt right toward us, but, more than that, he has thought right about us and our problems. He has combined deep sympathy with broad understanding. He has been not simply our "well wisher" but our constructive thinker. He has, moreover, not only felt right toward us and thought right about us but he has done things for us.

To recount his accomplishments of worth and service to railroad workers is to catalog the outstanding railroad legislation of recent years. I shall mention a few of them.

THE AMENDED RAILROAD LABOR ACT

In 1934 the Railroad Labor Act was so amended and revised as that today it stands as a model of legislation in the field of labor relations.

Thanks to that act, the right of railroad workers to organize and bargain collectively is established and now universally recognized. Through the use of the agencies set up under the act for the settlement of disputes between managers and men, the railroad industry has in recent years set an example for the industries of the country in the adjustment of disputes and the preservation of industrial peace.

To the achieving of these great and far-reaching results the counsel and leadership of Congressman CROSSER were invaluable.

RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

What railroad man can ever forget BOB CROSSER's fight for the Railroad Retirement Act? Not once or twice but three times he led the fight in Congress to the enactment of that measure.

The ink was scarcely dry on the opinion of the Supreme Court declaring the first act unconstitutional when he introduced a second bill so drawn as to meet the objections of the Court.

The opinion of the court did not shake his belief in the fundamental soundness of a national system for railroad pensions and he pressed on. While the suit brought by the railroads attacking the constitutionality of the second act was pending, the railroads gave up their fight and joined with the railroad labor organizations in working out a measure acceptable to both men and management. This bill embodying the underlying principles for which Congressman CROSSER had all along contended was passed by both Houses of the Congress, with only one dissenting vote. It is interesting to observe that the gentleman who cast the dissenting vote is no longer in Congress.

The bill thus agreed to and enacted is now a part of the law of the land, establishing the great national system for pensions for retired railroad workers. We might appropriately add another "R" to "Bob's" initials and let him be known, at least to all railroad men, as "R. R." CROSSER—"Railroad Retirement" CROSSER.

As the years go by and railroad workers grown old in the service reach out their hands to receive their pension checks, the name and devoted service of ROBERT CROSSER should come to their minds in grateful memory. And if, after he is gone, each aged worker to whose comfort in old age BOB CROSSER has contributed, should, as he receives his pension check, lay but a single rose upon his bier he would sleep forever beneath a wilderness of flowers.

RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION ACT

As the name of ROBERT CROSSER will be forever identified with the Railway Labor Act and the Railroad Retirement Act, so it will be likewise with the Railroad Unemployment Compensation Act. This last measure was of a complicated and technical character, difficult even for men experienced in legislative matters to grasp it in its full details. When this bill was presented to the lower House of Congress it was generally recognized that the Members of the Congress had not had the opportunity to give it the careful and exhaustive study which a bill of such a complicated nature required for its full and intimate understanding. It is not too much to say that the good favor and ready acceptance which this measure was accorded resulted in largest measure from the fact that it bore the name and carried the endorsement of ROBERT CROSSER. Many Members of Congress rose in their places to say that they accepted the measure because of their confidence in the integrity and high intelligence of Congressman CROSSER, and because they knew that he knew what was fair and just to railroad men, to the railroad industry, and the country, and that he would scorn to be unfair to any interest or to champion an unsound or an unwise measure. No greater tribute could be paid to any man; no greater evidence of the invaluable worth of a servant and leader of the people in the Congress of the United States.

OTHER WORK FOR US

Congressman CROSSER has served us as our friend and champion not only in his work for these notable measures but in relation to many others such as the signalmen's bill and a bill providing for an investigation of the question of a 6-hour day for railroad employees.

Great comfort and a deep sense of security have come to us in the knowledge that he is there on the job—not only wanting to protect our interests but with an unsurpassed ability to do so.

We rejoice that he is in Congress at this time when matters vitally affecting the railroad industry are pending before the Congress. We need, the whole country needs, statesmen who know and understand the railroad transportation system so that the highest possible intelligence may be applied to the solution of problems now confronting it. Such a statesman is BOB CROSSER.

CROSSER'S BROADER INTERESTS

By what I have said I do not mean to imply that Congressman CROSSER has been interested solely in railroad workers or the railroad industry. His interests are far deeper and broader than that. He is interested in railroad workers not only, but in all workers. He is the friend of labor, yes. But more than that, he is the friend of man. He is a Democrat, a Jeffersonian Democrat in the broadest sense of the term. He believes in equal and exact justice for all men. From this, his cardinal belief, have sprung his program and policies for railroad workers and workers as a whole.

He has brought to the consideration of social and economic questions a philosophy, a breadth of learning, and a capacity for sound thinking, of which few men are capable. His great speech on the floor of the Congress on the cause and cure for unemployment was an invaluable contribution to the study of that most perplexing and baffling problem. The people of Ohio will ever remember his outstanding work as a delegate to our State constitutional convention in 1912.

He has strengthened our faith in public men and in our Government itself. It is, I know, an all too common trait to criticize and condemn our leaders and public officials as incompetent or corrupt. It is wholesome and inspiring for a leader to appear who silences the critic's tongue and commands universal respect. He contributes to the great body of public opinion and confidence essential to the maintenance of popular government. There are millions of plain men and women in this country tonight whose faith in American democracy is strong and virile because BOB CROSSER has made it so.

CROSSER NEEDED NOW

If I had but one prayer to offer tonight, it would be this:

"God keep and preserve BOB CROSSER in full strength for many, many years, because we need him so."

We need him now of all times. Democracy is on trial in America and the world around. If we are to preserve it here, we must make it work. If we are to make it work we must have leaders who can think things through and then make the people understand their thinking.

On every hand we hear the cry:

"God, give us men!
A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands—
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor, men who will not lie—
Men who can stand before a demagogue and scorn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog in public duty and in private thinking."

Such a man is guest of honor tonight—BOB CROSSER. Because he is all that, we honor him, follow him, trust him, love him.

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE SAM RAYBURN, REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE FOURTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS, AT A TESTIMONIAL GIVEN IN HONOR OF THE HONORABLE ROBERT CROSSER, CLEVELAND, OHIO, APRIL 22, 1939

Mr. Toastmaster, Mr. CROSSER, and friends, frankly, I am deeply moved at this splendid tribute you pay to my friend, a great American, BOB CROSSER. Bob, it is worth living a long, a toilsome and an arduous life to have your fellow citizens pour out in numbers like this to pay you an honor that I know and that all Americans who know you believe you deserve. I have had no vacation since March 4, 1931. Then my party came into power in the House of Representatives and I became chairman of a great committee. Taking you a little further into my confidence, let me say that there is no other place when we adjourned yesterday that I would have gone because I need Saturdays and Sundays to rest. There is no other occasion that could have brought me away from Washington except to come here to raise my voice and by my presence say to you, his neighbors, and to all who listen and to all who may read, that I came because I love BOB CROSSER.

I have been a Member of Congress 26 years. Over the 26 years that it has been my honor and privilege to seek to serve I have served with more than 1,600 men.

It shows you how often constituents change their minds and change their Representatives in Congress. I am so far away from home that my words will not reach back there, and they will not help me politically in the Fourth Congressional District of Texas. But the great record that this man has made, the outstanding service that he has been to you and other people, has come about because the people of his congressional district in the beginning had the intelligence to send to Congress a capable man and keep him there. It matters not how brilliant a man may be, for during the 150 years in that body there has grown up, there is, and there will ever remain, the seniority rule. No man ever arose to leadership in either body of the Congress of the United States in 2 or 4 years. So let me say this to you, as I say to all people wherever I go, when you start out to select a Member of Congress, select one with good common sense, and that is all the sense there is. Select one with energy, and that means a great deal. Select one devoted to public service and then keep him there, for the longer he serves the more capable he is of service.

I was the Democratic chairman of a great committee for 6 years. There was a great Republican member of that committee. He is today the ranking minority member upon it, and I desire to read to you a telegram that he sent to me today, knowing that I was going to be here, to show you that all is not partisanship there; that there are patriots on both sides of the aisle and in our personal friendship the center aisle does not divide us. The telegram reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 22, 1939.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Care Hotel Hollander, Cleveland, Ohio:

I wish you would congratulate BOB CROSSER for me on the fine and deserved testimonial which his friends are giving him tonight. He has had a long and distinguished service in Congress. With you I have prized his friendship over the years and greatly admire him for his character and for what he is as well as for his record of patriotic, unselfish, and valuable public service.

CARL E. MAPES,
Member of Congress.

I am also happy to be here this evening to mix and mingle with you, and I want to say another thing—I am also one of those sentimental Scotchmen. I desire to pay tribute to the one who had marched by him and sustained him throughout the years, and through sunshine and rain has stood by him with deathless loyalty and devotion; who has been his helpmate, his partner, his great inspiration—Mrs. Crosser. I learned early in my life reading the history of our country that when I found a great man I looked around to find with him a great woman. There was the inspiration of the mother, sister, or wife in the life of every man in American history who has stood out and helped do the world's great work. When great matters affecting labor were referred to the committee of which I was chairman I did not take the authorship of them because I felt that sitting by my side was one more capable than I. And when these great measures of which Mr. Robertson has spoken came before that committee I always turned to one man and said, "Take them, where you lead upon them I will follow." That confidence I placed in BOB CROSSER has never been abused, and when measures governing things that he has made a study of came up in committee or upon the floor of the House, if I did not understand the question I resolved the doubt in favor of the side upon which Bob stood. You know, Bob has a thundering voice at times when he speaks of what ought to be. He is capable, he is intelligent, he is trustworthy, and in doing the things he has done for railroad workers, for other classes of labor, and many times the so-called forgotten man, he has not forgotten 130,000,000 of people who were involved. He has not been that kind of partisan that forget all the people of America whose wishes and interests should be taken into consideration. And a remarkable thing is in our lives as legislators we are many times misunderstood because we are acting upon a high theater—the highest in the world. And we must do things sometimes that some people do not understand for the moment but we must lead the people to think—not only to think but believe that justice can only come to the great body of our citizens when the things that come serve the least among them. Out there these inarticulate millions have, through the years, cried out for someone with a voice who could interpret their needs. They stand not in high places but they serve their land in peace as well as in war, and they must not be forgotten. Their buying power is an index to the prosperity and to the hope of this country and to the perpetuity of this great institution of ours.

We stand today not only nationally but internationally in what is said to be perilous times. Democracy not only in this land, but throughout the earth today is challenged by forces that would destroy. This Government of yours and mine, founded by our fathers, has stood unchanged in principle for a century and a half, and when I read the Constitution of the United States at times, and the more times I read it the more I am impressed, that these fathers over in Philadelphia wrote a document that has stood, and that none of its fundamentals had to be changed to meet changed conditions, and I wonder sometimes if the One who knows all things must have sat at their elbow and guided in the preparation of that document.

We want no one's territory. We covet nothing that any other nation upon the earth possesses. We want other nations and other people and other men to leave us alone in working out our problems. America wants no war with anyone but now, as in times past, if our rights are challenged, if our liberty is threatened, if our territory is coveted, and if a foreign foe ever should attempt to set its foot upon America, well, the American people when so threatened are willing to meet the world in arms. Democracy is facing a serious test. I am an unfailing optimist. If I were not so I could not carry many of the burdens that I have. I still believe in the honor, in the integrity, and in the virtue of men and women. I cannot believe that my mother's faith was misplaced when she felt that a Man walked the earth 19 centuries ago to teach people how to live and to make the world better. She did not believe that His life was in vain. Neither do I.

Troublesome times are upon us. It is a time that really tests the soul of men and women. It is the challenge to us, for us to answer—shall those who went before us, toiled, bled, and died, whether they toiled, bled, or died in vain. I do not think so. The clouds have been upon us for a few years; distress, want, and misunderstanding. I think in studying the history of our great country, when we were shaken by wars and dangers, even when the States went to war with each other, when the bitterness of sectional antagonism shot its fiery tongue into this great ship of state, and threatened to destroy it; those were troublesome times. Those were perilous days. But in my opinion the years beginning in 1927, 1928, and 1929, and extending until 1933 or 1934 were the most dangerous years in history. More faiths were destroyed, more hopes were lost, more of the seeds of evil, of disintegration, were about us than ever before. It is the greatest tribute to American manhood and womanhood that when times like these have come to us that they have selected and backed a leader whose shoulders were broad enough, whose brain was keen enough, and whose heart was big enough to deal with and solve our problems and when the mantle of leadership was placed upon his shoulders and the scepter was placed in his hands, he measured up to the high standards, hopes, and aspirations of the American people.

He has gone before the American people with head held high and shoulders erect and convinced them that he had a program and had the courage to carry it out. Such was the case in 1932. I think that the most heartening utterance delivered in America ever since the Declaration of Independence fell from the trenchent pen of Thomas Jefferson was the inaugural address of March 4, 1933, by Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The sun is going to shine again. Smiles have come to many faces where despair was written a few years ago. In my opinion we will again be a happy, hopeful people, and Bob, let me say to you that your great work, glad and willing and eager as you were to help do the world's great work, you have done much in a quarter of a century to lay the foundation for bringing back these smiles and to perpetuate through the years to come the glorious heritage that was transmitted to you and to me and all of us by the fathers of the Republic.

MR. CROSSER'S SPEECH

Mr. Toastmaster, Mr. Mayor, Congressman Rayburn, President Robertson, members of the committees in charge of arrangements for this affair, friends all:

While sitting here tonight I thought of a short verse, a copy of which was presented to me more than 30 years ago by a good friend who has long since passed from this earthly scene. The words so well express my own thought at this moment that I quote them:

"What deed or merit
Has been mine
That God to me
Should send
Of all His gifts
The most divine,
My other soul,
A friend?"

Calloused indeed would be he not moved by the friendship and affection manifested for me tonight. I can only say in the most earnest and sincere way possible, "Thank you," and I shall be grateful if indeed it be found that I shall have served the cause of humanity in even smaller measure than that credited to me so magnanimously tonight. Let me say, too, that if I have done anything worth while, the good people of the Twenty-first District have helped greatly. During my many political struggles when the opposition was great and the handicaps almost overwhelming, the people of the Twenty-first District stanchly supported and encouraged me. Their repeated return of me to Congress increased the effectiveness of my legislative efforts.

Mr. Toastmaster, even in our early years we all wonder what is the purpose of life. Well do I remember that as a lad finishing high school, I had been enthused by my instructors about becoming a great scholar and lawyer, and eager to emulate the example of the great public men of the previous generation.

Hardly a half dozen more years had passed, however, when I began to recognize the vanity of the mere effort to be familiar with the fashion in books, and in the striving for renown as a lawyer and for distinction in the public forum.

More and more it became evident that such attainments were sought primarily to distinguish their possessors from the rank and file of humanity and to give them a sense of superiority. Surely, thought I, the worthy life consists not of mere mental acrobatics nor in a skillful use of mental tools and weapons. On the contrary, man's duty is to more fully manifest truth, that is, reality, and so to increase the enjoyment of good by all mankind. That this must be the purpose becomes evident as we begin to realize the unity of creation, the oneness of all life. As a part of the unity, we must then act in harmony with the universal life and law, and so not only serve and benefit all others but ourselves as well.

All true activity must be in accord with the inherent and eternal laws of universal life; that is, of principle. Inherent in every one and necessary to all human progress is the right to freely speak and act for what he believes to be good, provided that in so doing he does not interfere with the exercise of the same right by others. That is the essence of democracy. The degree of democracy prevailing in any country is the measure of that country's civilization.

Now to be truly democratic government, the people must be assured of the right of direct and ultimate control of lawmaking, which is the most important function of government. The exercise of such control can be assured by providing for a vote of approval or disapproval upon laws passed by the representatives, when a reasonable number of people formally request such a vote. Direct control of public officials is also an essential of fundamental democracy.

Although, clearly, democracy is necessary to human liberty, there are some in our country who, parrotlike, talk about democracy's inefficiency. My friends, we must either be for government according to the will of the people, or be against it. If against it, we then favor government according to the will of some absolute ruler, whatever may happen to be his title, and that means denial of the individual's freedom to think and speak as he believes to be right. Even if the directive type of government could assure to the people enough food and clothing and other material things—which it cannot—the denial to the people of their freedom to think and speak their honest thought halts the progress of civilization. When not used, mental faculties lose their strength and vigor, just as the muscles of the body become weak and flabby from lack of use. This in the name of efficiency! Efficiency means the prompt doing of what has been decided to be done. Far more important is the moral question, whether or not it should be done at all, and that is democracy's first consideration.

Now, a word as to the economic policies of government.

For generations unemployment and its evils have harassed the people. Serious efforts have been made to remedy the trouble, but the end is not yet. Some explanation there must be for the continuance of the evil. Either injustice and its consequent distress and suffering are unnecessary and wrong or there is no ground for the statement, repeated throughout all Christendom, that God made all that was made, and behold it was very good. "Very good" means truly good.

One of the reasons why more progress has not been made in overcoming poverty and enforced idleness is that symptoms have generally been mistaken for causes. It has been observed that a few people possess great wealth and that the overwhelming majority have practically nothing. Thereupon some bombastic person denounces the few as if that would correct things. He does not realize that indulging in personalities never solved any problem.

The fact is that practically all those who have excessive wealth understand the cause of the unjust distribution of wealth no better than do those who have little.

My friends, all those having more wealth than they need might be killed tomorrow and their possessions divided among the others without in any way removing the cause of the unjust distribution of wealth.

Another explanation for failure to correct economic injustice is that among those who presume to speak learnedly there is a lack of standards of what is absolute or inherent right by which to test the justice of proposed measures. They urge action by government without apparent regard to the violation of fundamental rights of the individual.

The right principle ever exists, and upon it all human governments profess to base their laws and actions. In principle, everyone has the right to speak and act in such way as he believes will promote his happiness, provided that in so doing he does not interfere with like action by others. This is a personal right rather than a property right. It may also be stated to be the right to exercise the free play of one's individuality. Also, according to principle, all men inherently have equal rights in the bounties of Nature; that is, in the natural resources of earth. This is a right in common with others to natural advantages, and has the character of a property right. The two rights just mentioned are fundamental and no legislation, no governmental action, should disregard them.

Because no human being ever created a single particle of the earth, no one has a right to the exclusive ownership or monopoly of the earth or any part thereof. Rightful ownership of anything is based on the fact that the person claiming such ownership has created the thing in question or has received it from someone else who did create it or derived title from someone who created it.

The benefits that are entirely due to the possession of the natural resources—that is, of the earth or any part thereof—belong, then, to society as a whole, because no person or persons made or produced them. All must be assured, however, upon proper terms, of undisturbed possession of such natural resources as may be rightly in their control.

The possession by any person of the least productive part of natural resources used by society clearly gives him no special privilege or advantage, and he could not, therefore, be justly asked to pay for using what nobody else desires; but whatever may be the value of the additional productive power of the natural resources held by all other members of society belongs to all the people, and the yearly value of possessing such advantage should be taken by government for the benefit of all. Such additional productive power is not due to the energy, enterprise, or industry of those possessing the resources having greater productiveness.

On the other hand, the persons making the payments of such amounts to public authority are by every standard of right entitled to absolute and exclusive ownership and enjoyment of all they produce above and beyond what they so pay to society, and they should not be molested in the enjoyment of the same by any person or government. That is the product of their own efforts and is not due to the enjoyment of any special advantage or privilege or to the force of Nature. For the government to take any part of it is as wrong in principle as for a private person to take it from them.

The enforcement of this principle would supply government with sufficient funds for its operation. More important than that, however, it would prevent the evils of special privilege—that is, monopoly—because if we were to collect the full yearly value of possessing natural resources, then, in order to provide means to pay to society the yearly value of such possession, the holders would be forced to use the resources, and use them effectively, too. This increased use would create a demand for workmen and the increased demand for workers would soon end involuntary idleness. With unemployment abolished, wages would rise, for men would not work for less than is fair when they could procure employment from others, who, in order to procure their services, would pay what would be just.

With enough revenue paid to society for the use of natural resources, no longer would taxes be put on any of the things produced for the support and comfort of man. This would increase production, because removing the sales taxes, excise taxes, and all other kinds of taxes placed on the products of agriculture and industry would lessen the cost of such commodities by at least the amount of the taxes removed. Then as the prices should become less, more and more commodities would be sold, because more people could afford to buy the goods at the lower prices. On the other hand, when taxes are put on goods we increase the price, and then, because goods are higher priced, sales become fewer.

When it will be to the interest of holders of natural resources to make use of them, instead of to keep them idle, we shall have an increased demand for labor, which would soon end unemployment. With employment to be had by all who desire it, everyone would have means to purchase from merchants the comforts of life. Merchants would in turn buy more and more from manufacturers, and manufacturers, in order to supply the demand for their products, would need more workmen.

Men would thus be sure of employment, and no longer would prevail the constant fear of want which for ages has haunted mankind. Freed from worry and despair, men would then joyfully engage in creative effort. Desperation, resulting from want and fear of want, lead many in order to supply their needs to foolishly kill, rob, and engage in prostitution. Because they fear to assume the financial responsibilities of marriage, some men resort to libertinism. Men and women, once sure of economic justice, independence, and reasonable abundance of material comforts, would recoil from these evils which are wholly unnatural.

No longer dreading starvation and lack of material comforts, man will cease frenzied efforts to accumulate vast wealth, wholly unnecessary to a sane existence, and, in fact, harmful.

When comparatively little effort will supply material wants, and the making of a living shall have become only incidental to the real business of making a life, then will men turn to the work of developing the eternal verities of being. Then will he strive to understand, to become conscious of, the glorious realities of life which wait for recognition.

This will be the reign of harmony. To promote it is the duty and can be the joy of all. Let none shirk the call, believing death will end the task. Now or later we must unfold reality, we must manifest the true life.

Kipling pointed to this standard of life in the words which I quote as follows:

"When earth's last picture is painted and the tubes are twisted and dried,
When the oldest colours have faded, and the youngest critic has died,
We shall rest, and faith, we shall need it—lie down for an aeon or two,
Till the Master of all good workmen shall put us to work anew!

"And only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame;
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame,
But each for the joy of the working, and each in his separate star, Shall draw the thing as he sees it for the God of things as they are!"

Reality has ever existed. It will continue to exist without end. The philosopher, Herbert Spencer, said that that which is real is permanent; that which is not permanent is not real.

All the strength, beauty, harmony, and other elements of being ever exist or, to use Spencer's term, are permanent. Man's duty, then, is to become conscious of these infinite realities; his work should be to present to all mankind the magnificent truths which continually enter the chamber of his consciousness. This way lies happiness. When man grasps this true meaning of life, then, throughout all the earth will be concord. The unity of creation will be clear, and in each other men will see not only the likeness of the Creator but brothers all. In joyous unison will the sons of men sound forth the grand symphony of life. In perfect harmony will each promote good for all.

Not vain quest for personal glory, then, is the true purpose of life. The service of all creation, not of self, must be the watchword.

That great purpose, in a humble way, I have tried to serve. Whatever strength and talent I can command will be devoted to that end.

In the familiar lines with which I close, each one of us can gain inspiration for noble efforts to extend the joys of life to every fellow being. These are the lines:

An old man, going a lone highway,
Came, at the evening, cold and gray,
To a chasm, vast and deep and wide,
Through which was flowing a sullen tide.
The old man crossed in the twilight dim;
The sullen stream had no fears for him;
But he turned, when safe on the other side,
And built a bridge to span the tide.
"Old man," said a fellow pilgrim, near,
"You are wasting strength with building here;
Your journey will end with the ending day;
You never again must pass this way;
You have crossed the chasm, deep and wide,
Why build you the bridge at the eventide?"

The builder lifted his old gray head:
"Good friend, in the path I have come," he said,
"There followeth after me today
A youth, whose feet must pass this way.
This chasm, that has been naught to me,
To that fair-haired youth may a pitfall be.
He, too, must cross in the twilight dim;
Good friend, I am building the bridge for him."

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point and to include therein the speech of the Honorable SAMUEL RAYBURN, the response of Mr. CROSSER, the speech of Mr. D. B. Robertson, president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, and Enginemen, and the telegrams and messages I have referred to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio for 1 minute.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, Mr. ROBERT CROSSER has been such a distinguished Member of Congress and such a highly esteemed citizen outside of his services as a Congressman that we, the Republican Members from Ohio, are proud to join in this testimonial by our good friend, Judge SWEENEY, of Cleveland. Those of you who have had the privilege to serve in this House for some years will recall ROBERT CROSSER in his early days as a great advocate of the things for which the common man stood; and if we were to epitomize his accomplishments in one sentence, we would say, "ROBERT CROSSER is a man for men and among men."

We are proud to add to the tribute that Judge SWEENEY has paid to our distinguished colleague from Ohio. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today a bill known as the oppressive labor practices bill of 1939, which is a companion bill to S. 1970, which was recently introduced by Senators ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr., of Wisconsin, and ELBERT D. THOMAS, of Utah, of the Senate Subcommittee on Education and Labor known as the Senate Civil Liberties Committee. I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my own remarks at this point with reference thereto.

After a careful study of S. 1970, I have introduced the companion bill in the belief that it constitutes by far the most important legislative proposal that this Congress could pass for the benefit of the working people of this country. The bill embodies the results of the most thorough and comprehensive investigation of industrial conditions undertaken by any committee of the Congress in recent years—the 2½ years' investigation by the Senate Civil Liberties Committee. The bill prohibits as "oppressive labor practices" the long-standing evils exposed in that investigation.

When enacted, this bill should take rank with the Wagner Act and the Walsh-Healey Act, especially as the bulwark of the first. It accords with the objectives of these laws and will facilitate their administration. Historically, it should be recalled that the civil liberties investigation grew out of the demand by the administrators of the Wagner Act, formally laid before the Senate committee in 1936, that Congress should investigate antilabor conditions which were hampering the administration of the act. The resultant investigation has convinced the whole country. The conditions hampering labor law are still there. This bill makes a good beginning toward dealing with such conditions by law. Administering labor law will be less costly, in strife as well as in litigation, when this bill is passed, and labor rights will then be enjoyed in communities where liberty is denied by private force.

The bill's provisions are few and simple. Regarding the widespread and lucrative, though dirty, business of labor detective agencies and other means of industrial espionage, the bill forbids the use of labor spies. Regarding the similarly disreputable though profitable business of professional strikebreaking, the bill forbids the hiring of strikebreakers, who are defined as persons paid a bonus to replace regular employees on strike. Regarding the evil of privately paid armies of company police, used to war on unions and to deprive communities of civil rights, the bill forbids the employment of armed guards off company property. It forbids outright the employment of guards who have been convicted of crimes of violence. Regarding the menace of private arsenals in industrial plants, the bill forbids the use or possession of industrial munitions which are defined as machine guns, sawed-off shotguns, and long-range tear gas and sickening gas projectiles. These four evils are declared to be oppressive labor practices and prohibited under penalties of fine or imprisonment.

The bill provides enforcement through the Attorney General, together with injunctive remedies to be invoked by the Secretary of Labor. The bill bars from interstate commerce goods produced by an employer guilty of oppressive labor practices. The bill also amends the Walsh-Healey Act to bar Government contracts to employers engaged in oppressive labor practices.

The great majority of employers will have no objection to this bill. They are employers whose plants are not stocked up with machine guns and gas; who do not employ private armies to smash unions; who have never hired labor detectives and professional strikebreaking agencies. The bill is aimed at restraining the powerful minority of employers whose determination to frustrate collective bargaining has led them to use methods violative of civil liberties generally.

Even more directly than the Wagner Act, this bill makes for industrial peace. To take arms and armed men out of industrial disputes is certainly a peace measure. In no way does this bill deprive any employer of fully adequate means for legitimate property protection.

Labor is united in support of this bill. Both the old unions, which have long borne the brunt of such oppressive practices, and the newer unions, whose members have suffered from spies and gunmen, demand this legislation. In a sense hearings on this bill have already been held. In 2½ years the Civil Liberties Committee has heard 485 witnesses, whose testimony and the committee's reports on it already fill nearly 40 volumes. It is especially notable that no witness has stood up frankly to justify the practices exposed. Employer witnesses, who were given every opportunity to defend their acts, have tended instead to profess reform. But in fact reform will not come except through this legislation. To cite a single example from the facts in the record: The inventory of arsenals of two steel companies—Republic Steel Corporation and Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co.—included machine guns, rifles, revolvers, shotguns, gas guns, and all kinds of gassing equipment. Both arsenals totaled together 1,881 guns of all types, 313 gas guns, 153,930 rounds of ball ammunition, 10,234 rounds of shot-cartridge ammunition, and 10,064 items of gas ammunition. What earthly right has any pair of corporations to possess 153,000 rounds of bullets, even though the companies professed not to have used them during the Little Steel strike?

Widespread editorial comment already supports this bill. The New York Times of March 22, under the heading Traffic in Violence, says:

> The public has a right to object to a traffic which can only thrive when the public safety is menaced. It has a right to object to aggressive private armies, whether they represent the employer or the employee. If it is ever necessary to resort to the use of force in a labor controversy, that task must rest with the legally constituted authorities, who are directly responsible to the voters. Such seems to be the object of the present bill.

The St. Louis Star Times (March 29) says:

> Enlightened employers undoubtedly will hail this measure as another step toward industrial peace. And the ruthless die-hards and proponents of strong-arm tactics in dealing with labor undoubtedly will condemn it because it would deprive them of a privilege, not a right, which they have enjoyed for too long at the expense of the common man.

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (March 29) says:

> The bill is directed at a recalcitrant minority whose practices have long been a blot on the country's civil liberties record.

The Birmingham (Ala.) Post (March 25) says:

We believe the evidence disclosed by Senator LA FOLLETTE's long investigation shows the need for such a law. The dangers in permitting corporations to maintain private armies and equip them with the weapons of war are too great.

The only objection I have seen in print is the allegation that this bill "puts Uncle Sam into the business of policing strikes." That is precisely what this bill does not do. It does the very opposite. It restores the policing of disputes to the duly constituted public authorities. This bill eliminates those usurpations of public police authority by industrial corporations' private armies which have often wrecked the civil liberties of whole communities. This bill eliminates the corruption of local authorities by corporations furnishing them their private arsenals. And the bill accomplishes this with the minimum of regulation. It sets up no new enforcement agency, no Uncle Sam police system; it lays no burden on the fair-minded employer. It simply relieves the unfair-minded employer of the costly burden of buying machine guns and gas and hiring the private armies and the private spy agencies, whereby employers substitute their will for the common law of the land.

Finally the bill, by bulwarking the Walsh-Healy Act, would end an intolerable paradox. Taxpayers' money has helped support these oppressive labor practices. The Senate committee's report shows that 32 industrial companies used the labor spies of the National Metal Trades Association while they were enjoying United States Government contracts during the years 1933–36 in the amount of $12,090,579.69. Some of these spying corporations are the very ones against whom the National Labor Relations Board has been powerless to do more than to issue a cease-and-desist order. It is time that a bill should be passed affording recourse to criminal penalties and that taxpayers' money spent under Government contract should not contribute to practices which endanger our civil liberties.

In this day and age of a liberty-losing world, I am confident that Americans will support determined measures to protect a liberty-loving people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a congressional breakfast talk on the money question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 20 minutes on Wednesday next, after the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table and the legislative program of the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, about 2 weeks ago I introduced two bills which had particular reference to Japanese fishing boats on the Pacific coast. In order to cover the matter thoroughly, I find it is necessary to introduce another bill with reference to undocumented vessels.

On the Pacific coast these alien Japanese operate with a particular vessel and then, after they are at sea, change the number, and sometimes come in with an entirely different crew than was aboard when they started. The statute now provides a fine of only $10, which is easily raised. My bill will raise the amount of that fine to $1,000 and increase the height of the numbers to 6 inches and provide that the numbers must be permanently affixed to the vessel.

I hope the members of the committee that will receive this bill will give it immediate consideration.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a table showing imports of foreign products.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a short article which appeared in a New York newspaper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an editorial from the McConnellsville (Ohio) Herald.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief editorial from the Grand Island Daily Independent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech I delivered recently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, under date of April 19, 1939, I received the following letter:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
DEPARTMENT OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
April 19, 1939.

Hon. FRANCIS CASE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRANCIS: We are giving you below a copy of a resolution passed at the spring conference of the American Legion, which was held at Pierre, S. Dak., April 16, 1939.

Resolution

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this assembled conference of the American Legion, Department of South Dakota, that as to the European situation, the foreign policy of these United States be: To mind its own business, become involved in no entangling alliances, and let Europe settle its own problems without our interference or intervention."

Very sincerely,

J. D. MULLANEY,
Department Adjutant.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. St. Claire, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 4852, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes."

PEACE AND SECURITY WEEK

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert in the RECORD at this point the proclamation of the American Union for Concerted Peace Efforts in proclaiming April 26 to May 3 Peace and Security Week. The full text is as follows:

FULL TEXT OF PROCLAMATION FOR PEACE AND SECURITY WEEK

On behalf of the National Honorary Committee, which has responded to an invitation from the American Union for Concerted Peace Efforts, we proclaim that—

The week of April 26 to May 3 shall be known as Peace and Security Week.

We call on the American people to express their widespread conviction that international aggression must be stopped and economic justice among nations must be sought through peaceful means and not by threats or use of force.

Peace for the world and security to the United States depend upon the awakened conscience of the American people and its powerful expression. In the inevitable revision of neutrality legislation our public opinion and our Government should assert their influence to discourage and impede those who would rely upon aggression and force to dictate international policy.

We issue this proclamation believing that millions of Americans will participate in the activities of Peace and Security Week and that hundreds of local communities will make themselves heard in this expression of national unity and the American will to peace and justice.

DONALD R. RICHBERG, Chairman.
MRS. HENRY F. GRADY, Vice Chairman.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-seven Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 57]

Beam	Douglas	Johnson, Ind.	Pittenger

Crowther	Hoffman	Osmers	White, Idaho
Curley	Horton	O'Toole	White, Ohio
Darden	Hunter	Owen	Wolfenden, Pa.
Dies	Johns	Pierce, N. Y.	Zimmerman

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and sixty Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Without objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO FILE REPORT ON WAGE AND HOUR LEGISLATION

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Labor may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill H. R. 5435.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that also provides that, if there are any minority views to be filed, they may have permission to file them also?

Mrs. NORTON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Can the gentlewoman from New Jersey tell us when she expects to call that bill up?

Mrs. NORTON. The committee has not quite decided when, but not on next Monday, as has been stated.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It will not be called up on Monday?

Mrs. NORTON. No; it will not be taken up on Monday, I can assure the gentleman.

Mr. COX. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is this request made in connection with the wage and hour bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is.

Mr. COX. I would like to make inquiry if it is contemplated by the chairman of the committee, the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], that she will ask to be recognized to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill by that procedure?

Mrs. NORTON. The committee has not quite decided on that point as yet.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks and include a short editorial from the Des Moines Register and Tribune.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by Senator CAPPER, of Kansas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter from an agricultural authority, Mr. George N. Peek, dealing solely with the subject of agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a memorial from the Florida Legislature.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4492) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4492) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 8, 11, 12, 14, 28, 29, 32, and 33.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 10, 17, 19, 22, 24, 27, and 30, and agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4492) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

Treasury Department

On amendments Nos. 1, 2, and 3, relating to the Secretary's office: Accepts the action of the Senate in striking out the appropriation of $500,000 in the House bill for loan to the Alley Dwelling Authority; appropriates $146,660 instead of $148,160, as proposed by the Senate and $145,660 as proposed by the House, for personal services in the Chief Clerk's office; and appropriates $320,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $327,800, as proposed by the Senate, for custody of Treasury buildings.

On amendments Nos. 4 and 5, relating to the Customs Service: Accepts the amendment of the Senate striking out the provision in the House bill abolishing the office of surveyor of customs in the port of New York and seven comptrollers of customs with annual salaries aggregating $51,600 and restores this amount to the appropriation as proposed by the Senate.

On amendment No. 6: Appropriates $1,209,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $1,199,000, as proposed by the House, for salaries in the office of the Treasurer of the United States.

On No. 7: Strikes out, as proposed by the Senate, the limitation in the House bill on the amount that may be expended under the Bureau of Internal Revenue for personal services in the Intelligence Unit.

On No. 8: Appropriates $425,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $450,000, as proposed by the Senate, for salaries and expenses of the Federal Alcohol Administration.

On Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, relating to the Coast Guard: Appropriates $400,000 for personal services in the office of the Commandant in the District of Columbia, instead of $404,000, as proposed by the Senate and $395,660 as proposed by the House; increases from $10,000 to $30,000, as proposed by the Senate, the amount which may be utilized, under all appropriations, for motion-picture equipment; authorizes the use of $23,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $40,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the recreation of enlisted personnel; appropriates $265,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $275,000, as proposed by the Senate, for rebuilding and repairing stations; appropriates $136,000 for communication lines, instead of $142,000, as proposed by the Senate and $130,000 as proposed by the House; appropriates $206,750, as proposed by the House, instead of $209,250, as proposed by the Senate, for civilian employees; appropriates $477,000 for additional airplanes, instead of $654,000, as proposed by the Senate and $300,000 as proposed by the House.

On Nos. 17 and 18, relating to the Public Health Service: Appropriates $305,000 for prevention of epidemics, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $290,000, as proposed by the House; and appropriates $570,000 for the National Cancer Institute, instead of $440,000, as proposed by the House and $700,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 19: Appropriates $1,200 under the Bureau of the Mint, as proposed by the Senate, for furnishing medals as authorized by the act of June 20, 1938.

Post Office Department

On No. 20: Appropriates $388,500 for salaries in the District of Columbia in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster General, instead of $390,000, as proposed by the Senate and $387,000 as proposed by the House.

On No. 21: Appropriates $579,260 for personal services in the District of Columbia in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, instead of $580,520, as proposed by the Senate and $578,000 as proposed by the House.

On No. 22: Appropriates $798,560, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $792,000, as proposed by the House, for personal services in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General in the District of Columbia.

On No. 23: Appropriates $92,500 for personal services in the office of the Solicitor, instead of $90,000, as proposed by the House and $95,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On No. 24: Appropriates $47,240 as proposed by the Senate, instead of $46,500, as proposed by the House, for personal services in the office of the purchasing agent.

On Nos. 25, 26, 27, 28, and 29, relating to the Bureau of the First Assistant: Appropriates $6,975,000 for compensation to assistant postmasters, instead of $7,000,000, as proposed by the Senate and $6,950,000 as proposed by the House; appropriates $7,725,000 for clerks in third-class post offices, instead of $7,750,000, as proposed by the Senate and $7,700,000 as proposed by the House; appropriates $1,350,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $1,340,000, as proposed by the House, for carfare and bicycle allowance; and strikes out the increases proposed by the Senate for supervisory officials and clerks at air-mail transfer points and in the District of Columbia, payable from the appropriation for Domestic Air Mail Service.

On Nos. 30 and 31, relating to the Bureau of the Second Assistant: Increases, under the appropriation "Railroad transportation and mail messenger service," the amount that may be expended therefrom for cost-ascertainment purposes in the District of Columbia from $31,500, as proposed by the House, to $33,050, as proposed by the Senate; and appropriates $455,000 for miscellaneous expenses of the Railway Mail Service, instead of $450,000, as proposed by the House and $460,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 32 and 33, relating to the Bureau of the Third Assistant: Strikes out the increase of $1,000 and the additional authority, both proposed by the Senate, in connection with the sending of postal delegates to the British Philatelic Congress in London during the fiscal year 1940.

On No. 35, relating to the Bureau of the Fourth Assistant: Appropriates $10,450,000 for rent, light, fuel, and water for first-, second-, and third-class post offices, instead of $10,400,000, as proposed by the House and $10,600,000 as proposed by the Senate.

Amendments in disagreement

The committee of conference report in disagreement the following amendments:

On No. 34, relating to the proportion of funds in the bill that may be expended in the purchase of twine manufactured from materials or commodities produced outside the United States.

On No. 36, relating to the transmission through the mail free of postage by executive departments and independent establishments of official mail matter.

LOUIS LUDLOW,
EMMET O'NEAL,
GEORGE W. JOHNSON,
GEORGE H. MAHON,
JOHN TABER,
CLARENCE J. MCLEOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, as we prepare to pass the conference report of the Treasury-Post Office appropriation bill for 1940 and send it to the President for signature, let me accord it a final salute and remind the Congress and the country that it contains an item for $1,050,000,000 for the payment of interest on the national debt for the single fiscal year of 1940. It is a colossal amount. Yet we gloss it so lightly. As I recall, it received but three lines in the President's annual Budget message in January. It is so important that it bears dramatization and emphasis.

At the close of the Civil War the national debt was but two and two-thirds billions and the annual interest charge slightly over thirty-four and one-half millions. In 1914 the interest outlay on what we owed was about $23,000,000. Twenty-five years later, in 1939, it had climbed to the astronomical sum of one billion, and for 1940 it will be $1,050,000,000 or more.

Going back a quarter of a century to 1914, the entire cost of government was less than the amount of the annual interest on our national debt in 1939 and 1940. In that year total cost of the Government was but $1,019,000,000, and with that sum we provided for the Army and Navy, the Post Office, for pensions, for Indians, and for all the expenditures of the regular departments of government. It was 1914 that the expenditures of government crossed the billion-dollar mark for the first time since the Civil War. In hushed tones the citizenry of the Nation mentioned the fact that we had become a billion-dollar country. Today the mention of an annual interest charge of more than a billion evokes little more than the supercilious elevation of an eyebrow.

Think of what could be done with the billion which we must now pay each year for the use of the money which Uncle Sam has borrowed. It would build 350,000 trim and cozy cottages costing $3,000 each and go far toward the solution of the unsolved housing problem. For the fiscal years from 1933 to 1940, inclusive, we will have paid more than $7,000,000,000 in interest on borrowed money, and with that sum we could build 2,350,000 comfortable homes for 2,350,000 American families.

In 1914 we moved into the billion-dollar class for annual expenditures, we had a population of 95,000,000, and the debt service was about $23,000,000. Today we spend about nine and one-half billions annually, have a population of 130,000,000, and pay over a billion in interest charges each year on the debt load. In that quarter of a century population has increased 37 percent and interest on the debt has increased by 4,400 percent. The figures indicate an unhealthy relationship.

It has another aspect. The President estimated the revenues for the fiscal year 1940 at $5,569,000,000. With the interest on the national debt at $1,050,000,000, it means that about 20 cents out of every dollar that Uncle Sam collects from the taxpayers in 1940 must go for interest on borrowed money. No private business could carry that load and long endure. Is there any reason to believe that Government business can prosper under such a burden? [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, certain amendments in disagreement are more or less controversial, but, inasmuch as ample time will be given for their discussion, I now move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 34: Page 69, line 25, after the word "devices", insert the following: "(not more than one-half of the funds herein appropriated for the purchase of twine shall be expended in the purchase of twine manufactured from materials or commodities produced outside the United States)."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LUDLOW moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 34 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter proposed to be inserted by such amendment, strike out "one-half" and insert in lieu thereof "three-quarters."

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLASON].

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, this matter was first considered by the House about 2 months ago. This amendment deals with the purchase of twine by the Post Office Department. At one time the Post Office Department bought cotton twine for its purposes, but for the past 18 years it has in each instance purchased twine made from jute. Jute comes to the United States from India in the raw state and is manufactured into twine by American labor in American mills.

This item carries about $325,000 for twine. It was stated in the debate in February by one of those favoring cotton twine that he would guarantee that the difference in price would be only from $1,000 to $2,000. This, of course, is not correct. Last year, when bids were asked on this contract, jute twine was bid at 11¼ cents a pound and cotton twine 14½ cents a pound, or a difference of 3½ cents. The difference is about 28 percent. On the basis of $325,000 to be expended for twine, the loss to the taxpayers of the United States through the purchase of cotton twine would be $91,000.

The cotton twine which was bid on last year would have been made in Hickory, N. C. The jute twine which is now used by the Post Office Department is made in Allentown, Pa. During the past 18 years about 600 persons have been continuously employed at least 6 months in every year in these jute mills making this twine for the Post Office Department. So that, so far as American labor is concerned, there are 600 American wage earners with 18 years of experience in the manufacture of jute twine whose jobs are at stake. I feel that these 600 persons with their families have a right to know what the Congress is voting upon and have a right to be heard in connection with this issue. They should not be thrown out on the sidewalk without any jobs unless there is a good reason for it.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I must decline to yield.

Here is the situation. This amendment was not before the House committee. No evidence was ever given at any hearings. The employees of these mills were never given a chance to have their side presented. Before a subcommittee of the Senate, dealing with this subject matter, however, evidence on the subject was presented. The amendment was not presented, to be sure. The tactics seem to be to wait until you get to the floor of the House or the Senate and then wait for a moment to catch somebody off guard and take chances on winning, because no committee upon a hearing of the facts would vote in favor of this amendment.

What did the Senate subcommittee do?

They voted down this amendment by a vote of 6 to 1. They had evidence which was presented to them by representatives of the Post Office Department. In connection with that I call attention to the fact that the Post Office Department does not desire this amendment and does not desire cotton twine.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, Senator HAYDEN, speaking in the other body in regard to this amendment, stated:

I wish to say, however, that in considering this matter the committee relied very heavily upon representations made by the officials of the Post Office Department to the effect that as yet a cotton twine has not been devised which can be handled by the employees in such a way as not to cut their fingers.

Senator O'MAHONEY, a former Assistant Postmaster General, stated in the Senate:

Not only is the fact as stated, but the cotton twine is so much superior as a binding force, because it is harder to break, that it slows up operations in the post office. That is one of the primary reasons why the Post Office Department desires twine which will merely hold the bundles together, with the least trouble to the clerks who are using it.

In other words, jute twine is the more satisfactory twine and it is $91,000 cheaper on the purchase of $325,000 worth of twine than cotton twine. The only thing that is involved which is foreign is the raw material, which comes in here and is manufactured in American mills by American workers. You have voted on this once. You voted down a similar amendment by a vote of 103 to 74 about 2 months ago. I ask you again to stand by these 600 Americans who are now gainfully employed and not by an arbitrary vote, without hearings and without giving them any opportunity to defend themselves, throw them out on the street. I ask you to vote "No" on this motion.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE].

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who preceded me is not fully aware of the facts. For nearly 10 years now I have gone into the matter of cotton twine as compared with jute twine. I may say to the gentleman that last year twine that was made by a manufacturing plant in my district was submitted, as a test, by the Post Office Department to the post offices in Rochester, N. Y., Springfield, Ohio, St. Louis, Mo., and two or three other offices. It was reported that the employees would rather use the cotton twine than the jute with one exception.

With reference to the matter of cost, I grant that if you take it on the question of poundage there is a considerable difference in cost, but if you take it on the matter of yardage, because cotton is much lighter than the jute twine, there is not so much difference in favor of jute.

When the gentleman talks about this subject he must, of course, realize that in the South cotton farmers raising a native product are entitled to a preference over foreign twine or a foreign product that comes into the United States. We are not asking that cotton twine totally supplant jute. We only ask for enough to conduct an experiment to show that it can be done and can be used and for this purpose we request that one-fourth of the amount appropriated be used for cotton and three-fourths for jute.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. May I say to the gentleman that the Ludlow people who are protesting the adoption of this amendment have benefited as a result of preferential treatment in the set-up of our tariff laws to the extent of many, many millions of dollars. If the gentleman will look at the vegetable fiber section of the act and study its history, he will find proof of what I say.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I realize that what the gentleman has just stated is the fact. I am not speaking simply because twine is manufactured in my district. Nor am I speaking for the cotton farmers of my district. But I am here speaking to give the textile plants, whether they be in New England, in the South, or in the West, and the cotton farmers of the South a chance to compete with a foreign product, and am asking that the conference report be adopted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, there is not very much money involved in the pending amendment, and it would hardly be worth much of the time of the House on a basis of money consideration; but from the standpoint of principle there is a great deal at issue in the amendment which is presented to the House by the subcommittee of which I have the honor to be a member. Frankly, the amendment does not ask for very much for the domestic cotton producer. It does not ask enough.

Let me restate the proposition. When the Post Office appropriation bill was before the House in February, those of us who were interested in cotton twine were unable to get any provision into the bill requiring the use of any cotton twine by the Post Office Department. The Senate, when it considered the bill, provided that at least one-half of the twine purchased by the Department should be of domestic origin, meaning cotton, of course. This put the issue in conference between the House and Senate. The pending amendment is the best we could get at the time. It is a compromise by the conferees. It provides in effect that at least one-fourth of the twine used by the Post Office Department shall be of cotton. In my opinion, 100 percent of the twine used by the Department ought to be of cotton. But that is impossible under the situation now, and it is up to us to hold this 25-percent requirement. Surely, within the next few years the Post Office Department will gladly consent to use cotton twine altogether.

There is no use in sensible men saying that cotton is not sufficiently good to tie bundles in the post office. As everyone knows, cotton is one of the finest fibers in all the world. No time need be used in arguing the virtue of cotton as a fabric for the most beautiful and delicate dress or as a fabric for sturdier use in the commerce of the world. It is a fine fiber. This jute, stripped from a plant grown in India, is not comparable to cotton at all.

There are those who have said that the jute twine is more satisfactory to the Post Office Department because cotton has a certain elasticity; however, recent experiments have shown that cotton, for the particular use in question, is superior to jute from every angle. If our scientists are so lacking in skill and ability that they cannot make a cotton twine which is adequate to tie up letters in the post office, we had better consign our research laboratories to the scrap heap and renounce all claim to ingenuity and scientific skill.

May I read what the Cotton Utilization Research Section of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics has to say as to the merits of cotton as a twine for use in tying up letters? This ought to settle the question as to whether or not cotton is suitable for such use. Those making the test used twine made of jute and twine made of cotton in tying packages that were then shipped through the mails. After they had made a study of the two fibers they made a report in a letter addressed to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], who has been very much interested in this matter, and this is part of the report:

> Reports made by Bureau representatives upon receipt of the packages at the various points showed that both the packages tied with cotton and those tied with jute twine arrived in sufficiently good condition to be returned without the necessity of having the twine replaced or retied. The packages tied with cotton twine appeared to be in slightly better condition, on the average, than did the packages tied with jute twine, but no appreciable differences were noted in any respect. * * *
> As a whole, the bundles tied with cotton twine were tigher than those tied with jute. No appreciable difference was detected in regard to cutting of envelopes and disarrangement of letters in bundles.

With 11,000,000 bales of surplus cotton in the hands of the Government, produced by American workers in American cotton fields, it would seem to be most ridiculous and absurd, indeed, for the Congress to turn down the application of the cotton farmer for 25 percent of the trade of the Post Office Department in twine used by that Department.

The Post Office Department uses 2,200,000 pounds of twine. We are asking only that in the next fiscal year one-fourth of this poundage of twine be made of cotton, for the purpose of consuming cotton—just one-fourth. Certainly that is little enough. I almost apologize for asking no more, yet that was the conference report and agreement on the matter, and no further request can now be made. Undoubtedly within the next year or so the Post Office Department will use cotton exclusively for twine purposes as is now the case in the many thousands of mail sacks used by the Department. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, as one who believes in the system of protection for the American producer, I am going to vote to accept the Senate amendment. [Applause.] You cannot have spot protection in this country and be prosperous. It must be general. I appeal to the Members on my side of the aisle to support the amendment. It is true this does not amount to much so far as it affects the total of our surplus cotton; but a principle is involved, and that is, either we must stand by the American producer or open the doors yet wider to imports from the entire world. The trouble with our country today is that we are importing altogether too much of everything that we can produce at home. That is the main reason for our unemployment. You cannot put the idle back to work and you cannot reopen the mills unless you give necessary protection not only to the North but to the South, the East, and the West. I think this is a mighty good place to start acting on that principle. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time not for the purpose of repeating any of the arguments that have heretofore been advanced on this matter, the question having been pretty fully discussed, but for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that on the passage of the agricultural appropriation bill through the House the amendment of my colleague the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], which has the effect of requiring the Department of Agriculture to use altogether cotton twine in the operations of that Department, was accepted by this House with only three votes against it. If it is wise, if it is feasible, and if it is economically justified to have the Department of Agriculture use altogether cotton twine, there certainly appears to be no reason why the modified amendment offered by the subcommittee having this bill in charge, to have the Post Office Department use 25 percent cotton twine in the filling of its needs for twine, should not be adopted. I simply wish to offer that observation because it has not yet been called to the attention of the House in this debate that you have already adopted a policy almost unanimously, insofar as the Department of Agriculture is concerned—that is, the policy of having cotton twine used altogether. To provide in this bill that the Post Office Department must or can use altogether jute twine in its operations would be distinctly out of line with the policy you have already approved in the agricultural appropriation bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER].

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, this proposition is not merely a question as between jute and cotton, but is more fundamental than that. It goes to a matter of principle. It seems to me that writing into this appropriation bill a provision forcing the Post Office Department to use cotton, although they prefer to use jute twine, is class and sectional legislation, and you are trying to do here through an appropriation bill something that you have not been able to accomplish by regular legislative action.

To my mind, the question in this is a matter of principle. If we are going to pass legislation in favor of the cotton industry which will have the effect of destroying industries that have been built up over years and years for the manufacture of twine, I say it is a matter of sectional legislation. It would be all right to do that if it had no adverse effect on any other American industry. But we have here the jute-twine manufacturers who, by their industry and prudent management and their large investments, have been making a living for themselves and for their workmen who have learned the trade, and now the Congress comes along and seeks to pass legislation which will practically destroy that industry. If we start out on this path, God knows where we shall end. It means that no American businessman can go into business and feel satisfied the Central Government of the Nation will not step in some time and pass a law that will wipe out his efforts and his natural advantages and give a fake advantage to some competitor who is not able to get along. This is unfair legislation, it is provincial legislation, and it is prejudicial to the best interests of the manufacturers of this country. It is unfair for the reason that it does not allow the exercise of free enterprise.

We all know that recently many conventions have been held to break down trade barriers which different States have been setting up seemingly in order to protect their own industries.

We know that the trend toward setting up trade barriers is in the wrong direction. We know the policy of this administration insofar as free trade is concerned and doing away with trade barriers. If this Congress will turn around and legislate for a certain section of the country to the detriment of manufacturers and industries which have developed throughout long years, I say it is a step in the wrong direction and a bad tendency. It will cause bitterness; it will cause retaliation on the part of other industries and other sections; it will destroy the confidence of every tradesman, every man who goes in for some particular trade, and destroy the confidence of the businessmen for the Congress to step in and legislate in this way, after he has spent all his life and thousands and perhaps millions of dollars in developing a particular industry. Think of the manufacturers in different parts of the country who will be practically ruined by this legislation.

I say if the Post Office Department desires to use jute or desires to use the kind of material which has been demonstrated throughout years of usage as being the best, we should not, through an appropriation bill, attempt to legislate in favor of some particular section of the country to the detriment of other interests involved.

This is prejudicial legislation and is legislation contrary to the policies of this administration as is proven by the many attempts in the past few years that have been made to do away with trade barriers.

I say that if this legislation is passed, other industries that are weak will come to the Congress and sit on your doorstep and beg of you to enact some measure which will protect their industries and help them to overcome the competition which they may claim they cannot overcome.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Parkman in his testimony before the Senate committee made the statement that he had taken the World Almanac and figured the average cotton crop for a number of years and found that the twine requirements would amount to about thirty-three ten-thousandths of 1 percent of the average cotton crop. So we are not helping the cotton growers very substantially by this legislation.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The few extra bales of cotton that will be used through this measure will react, as I said before, to the detriment of the cotton growers of this country, and I hope that this Congress will stand on its own feet and defeat the Senate amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I trust I may have your close attention so that we may get the issue clearly.

The Senate adopted an amendment providing that at least 50 percent of the twine used by the Post Office Department should be made of materials grown in the United States. The conferees, after extended discussion, disagreed with that, and the conference committee has instead offered the present amendment to provide that at least 25 percent of the twine used by the Post Office Department shall be of American-grown materials—merely 25 percent.

The first statement that was made here which I want to clear up is, that this would put 600 people out of work. The Ludlow Manufacturing Co., which has plants in Massachusetts and in Pennsylvania—and I understand the interest of some Members in the welfare of that concern—has its men engaged in making jute twine, cotton twine, cordage, linen goods out of flax, and those men are making all of these different flax and jute commodities. If we turn to cotton, they will engage in making cotton twine, because that company makes many times more cotton twine than it makes jute twine.

Now, this is the issue involved here, and there is nothing else involved. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLASON] stated that on the last purchase by the Post Office Department the bid on cotton twine was 3½ cents per pound higher than jute twine. Now, I will tell you why. I have here a ball of cotton twine and it weighs exactly 1 pound and it contains 1,350 yards. This identical pound of jute twine contains only 850 yards.

There was a 3½-cent difference in the bids on a pound basis, and for 18 long years the Post Office Department has refused to ask for bids on a yardage basis; and while it may be wrong for Congress to legislate on a particular subject like this, I say to you, in my place as a Member of this House, that this legislation is necessary to force your Post Office Department to at least give the cotton farmer an even break and give his commodity a chance to participate in the bidding on a fair basis.

That is all that I am asking. Give us a chance to bid, and if we cannot compete with jute on a reasonable basis, I shall not make another request.

They say that cotton twine has a lot of stretch in it. Will someone take a piece of this and just see how much stretch there is in it. Let me tell you what happened last month. The Department of Agriculture took 10 packages of letters weighing 2 pounds each. They wrapped 5 packages in jute twine and the other 5 packages were wrapped in cotton twine like this. They mailed them to Chicago, San Francisco, New York, Atlanta, and Dallas. They were sent there and then they were returned. The report of the cotton utilization research of the Division of Cotton Marketing, made to me on March 30, 1939, is as follows:

The tests were conducted as follows:

Five lots, each consisting of eight bundles of letters, four tied with cotton and four tied with jute twine, each bundle weighing approximately 2 pounds, were sent from Raleigh, N. C., to offices of this Bureau in the following places: San Francisco, Calif.; Atlanta, Ga.; New York, N. Y.; Chicago, Ill.; and Dallas, Tex.

The 40 packages were tied by an experienced mail clerk in the Raleigh, N. C., post office in order to insure, so far as possible, attaining equal tension on the packages. All jute twine used in the experiment had a small section marked with red dye so that it could be determined whether or not the twine had broken and was replaced in transit. No mark was placed on the cotton twine, as no post office or Railway Mail Service had such twine in stock and any replacement made would be evident.

Our representatives in these cities were asked to report particularly on the following points: (1) Comparative looseness of the jute and cotton twine; (2) condition of the letters, as to whether or not they seem to have shifted in the packages; and (3) whether the ends of the envelopes had been cut by the twine.

Reports made by Bureau representatives upon receipt of the packages at the various points showed that both the packages tied with cotton and those tied with jute twine arrived in sufficiently good condition to be returned without the necessity of having the twine replaced or retied. The packages tied with cotton twine appeared to be in slightly better condition, on the average, than did the packages tied with jute twine, but no appreciable differences were noted in any respect.

The various packages of letters were then retagged and returned by franked mail to our Bureau representative at Raleigh, N. C., who examined each bundle and found their condition to be as follows:

All bundles, with the exception of one tied with jute and one tied with cotton, both send from Chicago, were received intact. The twine on these two bundles had evidently slipped off the ends or broken during the return trip. The original jute twine on one other package had been replaced with a heavier twine. As a whole, the bundles tied with cotton twine were tighter than those tied with jute. No appreciable difference was detected in regard to cutting of envelopes and disarrangement of letters in bundles.

Although these tests indicate that this new cotton twine is fully satisfactory, I think it is well to point out that the trial was on such a small scale that the results should be considered as preliminary in nature until the twine can be tried out more extensively by actual regular use in the Post Office Department.

On a yardage basis this new cotton twine is only slightly higher in price than the last jute twine supplied on bids to the Post Office Department.

We shall be pleased to keep you advised on subsequent developments and greatly appreciate your interest in our efforts to extend the uses of American cotton.

In the meantime, if there is any further information which we may be able to supply you, please let us know.

Sincerely yours,

R. J. CHEATHAM,

In Charge, Cotton Utilization Research, Division of Cotton Marketing.

Here is the trouble. I have here in my hand the specifications of the Post Office Department last year when they bought 2,200,000 pounds of twine. The specifications fix purchase by the pound. Is that significant? A letter from the Bureau of Agricultural Economics with reference to a new cotton twine states:

This twine contains about 1,350 yards per pound, as compared with 850 yards for the jute twine, and with the present price of cotton, this larger yardage will make the cost of the cotton twine, on a unit of use basis, approximately the same as that of the jute now being used.

But the specifications of the Post Office Department do not invite bids on a "unit of use" basis, on a yardage basis, but only on a pound basis, which gives jute a preference of from 25 to 50 percent.

The last purchase of 2,200,000 pounds of jute twine by the Post Office Department was from the Ludlow Manufacturing Co. at 11.25 cents per pound. There was only one other bid, which was for cotton twine submitted jointly—in a combined bid—by three Massachusetts cotton mills, and their low bid was 14.50 cents per pound. The difference was 3.25 cents per pound, or about 28 percent, and the Post Office Department turned down the cotton-twine bid as not coming within the 25-percent differential authorized by the regulations of the Procurement Division under the "Buy American" law.

But how different it would have been if the Department's specifications had been fair to cotton and asked for bids on a yardage basis. With 850 yards in a pound of jute twine and 1,350 yards in a pound of cotton twine, there are 500 yards, or over 50 percent more, in the cotton twine on a "unit of use" basis. Cotton would not even have to take advantage of the 25-percent differential under the "Buy American" plan, but could fight it out on even terms with jute. Or if you figure 800 yards for jute and only 1,000 yards for cotton twine, there is 25 percent more yardage in the cotton, and this would more than bring them within the "Buy American" law.

The act of March 3, 1933, known as the "Buy American" law, directly commands, requires, and directs the different departments to use supplies manufactured from materials produced in the United States, unless the head of the department "shall determine it to be inconsistent with the public interest" or "the cost to be unreasonable."

Your attention is next called to the provision in the specifications which states that the breaking strength of the jute twine "must average not less than 20 pounds," and for cotton twine it must be "not less than 16 pounds nor more than 20 pounds." How kind they are to jute. It can have weak spots, breaking at 5 or 10 pounds, and it can have strong, heavy spots, breaking at 40 or 50 pounds. But not cotton. The cotton manufacturer must use great care; he must spin with perfection; his product must not have any irregularities or weak and strong spots; he is allowed only a 4-pound difference in the weakest and strongest spots in millions of yards.

And you will notice that the specifications make no requirement as to the size or diameter of the jute twine, but as to cotton, poor cotton, the diameter must not be less than 0.04 of an inch. How kind they are to jute.

You will not find any requirements in the specifications as to the knot strength or knot break for this twine. It is bought for tying up the mail, and every package must have one or more knots. Is the absence of that requirement significant? One of the largest twine manufacturers in the world writes this:

Jute is very much weaker in the knot than cotton, as it does not flex as readily. A tied bundle is no stronger than the knot, yet the Post Office Department does not specify knot breaks.

And the Bureau of Standards can give you some very helpful information as to the need of testing knot strength and how unfair it is between jute and cotton not to require it.

Is cotton, an American commodity, receiving fair treatment? Last year there was only one bidder on cotton twine; the year before there were none. One of the principal twine manufacturers in the United States writes:

These specifications are so drawn that it is utterly impossible for cotton to compete with jute, and because of the hopelessness of this we have quit bidding on Post Office requirements.

For 18 long years they have used a foreign product to tie your mail and my mail and to carry the mail to the rural mail box of the humblest cotton producer in the South, while we have at this hour 17,000,000 bales of cotton on hand and your Government has an investment in that cotton, in the way of loans, of $660,000,000. This jute is produced in India and is shipped into this country in the raw product without tax or tariff.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. In a moment. We are asking that our Government use American commodities in its own departments, but in this case the committee has reported an amendment for only 25 percent of cotton twine for the Post Office Department. We are forced at this time to accept that amendment, and we have accepted it because for the first time in 18 years it will give cotton an opportunity to compete, and if cotton does not come well within the "Buy American" law, I promise you as a Member of this House that I will not request a renewal of this amendment in the next session. Let them make a purchase of cotton and jute on fair specifications for cotton, and if it is not well within the "Buy American" law I will not ask a renewal of this matter. Let me say one thing more before I yield. For the last 6 months you Republican Members have had a great deal to say about the American farmer being entitled to the American market. How, then, can you vote against this amendment to give the American farmer at least 25 percent of the twine used by the Post Office Department?

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Yes.

Mr. MAHON. I am in accord with every statement the gentleman has made, and it is my understanding that the attitude of the Post Office Department has been modified by reason of the tests of this new twine that has been perfected, and we cannot now say that the Post Office Department is really opposed to this amendment.

Mr. PACE. In view of these tests, I do not see how they could be against it.

Mr. MAHON. They ought to be for it, and I presume they are for it.

Mr. PACE. You know the jute people make millions while these jute products now used in this country are displacing over 2,000,000 bales of cotton. Here is the estimate:

Imported jute

[Bales of 478 pounds net]

Bags:
Mill feed		248,000
Fertilizer		74,000
Sugar		62,000
Potatoes (white)		56,000
Wheat (bran and shorts)		50,000
Flour (all kinds)		19,000
Other (for other products and sundry purposes)		111,000
Total		620,000
Bagging for wrapping bales of cotton (12,000,000 bales)	135,000
Textile wrappings (bales covering manufactured goods)	90,000
Wool carpets and rugs	95,000
Twine and cordage (including tying United States mails)	75,000
Road building	100,000
Rags for U. S. Navy, low-grade cotton	8,000
Other	85,000
Total		538,000
Grand total		1,208,000

Imported hard fibers

Binder twine and rope	550,000
Other (mostly twine and cordage)	600,000
Grand total hard fibers		1,150,000
Grand total jute and hard fibers		2,358,000

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman observed that there was no tariff on jute. May I inquire whether the gentleman is in favor of a tariff on jute?

Mr. PACE. I said there was no tariff on raw jute.

Mr. MOTT. There is a tariff on jute when it comes in in the manufactured state?

Mr. PACE. Yes; there is a tariff on jute in the manufactured state. As long as we continue the present system of high protective tariffs I certainly think the farmer should be protected the same as the manufacturer, and I favor a tariff on jute to protect the cotton farmers of the South.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman favors a tariff on jute?

Mr. PACE. And a good high one, too.

Mr. MOTT. I am glad to hear that. [Applause.]

Mr. PACE. I hope the gentleman favors it.

Mr. MOTT. I do. Does not the gentleman believe that we can get a better solution of this problem if we would put a tariff on raw jute and keep the American twine market for the people who produce the raw material for twine in the United States?

Mr. PACE. Of course, I believe in that. We have been trying for 5 years to put it on, but have had no success up to this time.

Mr. MOTT. Has the gentleman tried to get a tariff on raw jute?

Mr. PACE. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOTT. And the administration is against it; is that the reason?

Mr. PACE. Well, I would not want to say that. I do not know the official position of the administration on jute in particular. I do regret that the administration appears to be bitterly opposed to giving the farmers better protection against foreign vegetable oils. I do not see why the agricultural sections are not entitled to the same protection as the industrial sections. We should all be treated alike.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COTTON TWINE VERSUS JUTE TWINE

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on this subject at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the Post Office Department for many years has been using jute twine in its business of transporting mail, the cost of which exceeds $300,000 annually. It is my further understanding the twine used is manufactured in this country from raw jute imported free of duty from foreign countries, and that the purpose of this amendment is to direct the Post Office Department to substitute cotton twine to the extent of 25 percent of the quantity used each year. The proponents of the amendment insist that this is only fair and just to the American producer as well as the American manufacturer in that it is an effort to have the Government consume the products of American soil instead of buying and encouraging the importation of foreign products to compete with the labor and producers in the United States.

Opponents of the amendment insist that the Post Office Department prefers to use the jute twine because it is easier handled and is better material. However, the proponents of the amendment, particularly the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE], a member of the committee, has stated in his argument and submitted evidence that cotton twine is not only easier handled but it is much better in quality and safer for wrapping purposes. It appears to me the illustration he gave from a report of the cotton-utilization research of the Division of Cotton Marketing made a few months ago is conclusive that cotton twine is stronger and better adapted for wrapping purposes than jute twine.

Opponents of the amendment say further that jute twine is cheaper than cotton twine by as much as 3½ cents per pound. There seems to be no doubt about that, but according to the evidence submitted to the committee a pound of jute twine contains only 850 yards, whereas a pound of cotton twine contains 1,350 yards, or nearly 60 percent more wrapping capacity than a pound of jute twine, making the cotton twine just about as cheap or possibly cheaper than jute. It appears, therefore, from a practical standpoint, cotton twine is preferable to that of jute twine; but the opponents of the amendment proceed further and say that it is unwise and improper for the Government to enact legislation of this kind, for the reason that it is contrary to the policies of this administration and prejudicial legislation. This seems to be the argument advanced by practically all of those opposing the amendment ,but surely they are not sincere in this argument or they have lost sight of the fact that the recent appropriation bill for the United States Veterans' Administration provided specifically that the United States veterans' hospitals would not be allowed to use any substitute for American butter in feeding veteran patients at veteran hospitals, the primary argument being that this legislation was for the purpose of protecting the dairy industry of the United States as against butter of any kind made from imported copra or coconut oil.

To illustrate how inconsistent the opponents of this amendment are we find that practically all of them insisted on favoring the policy of the Government protecting our home industry against the products of copra, a foreign product or crop and imported into the United States on the free list, but now they seriously object to an even 25 percent division in the use of twine in the Post Office Department when this twine is all made from hemp imported into the United States free of duty; and yet they have the nerve, the audacity, and the effrontery to object to this amendment on the ground, as they say, that it is an attempt to legislate in favor of a particular section of the country to the detriment of other interests involved. The only other interest that could legitimately be involved would be the manufacturer of jute and he could manufacture cotton just as well as jute, and my idea is the only reason he does not do it today is that he can get jute cheaper and make a bigger profit on it than he can by using cotton. Certainly there could be no objections on the part of the employee because he could manufacture cotton twine just as easily as jute and I imagine the work would be a great deal lighter and more sanitary.

The real purpose of this amendment is to determine by experiment whether the Post Office Department can render just as efficient and satisfactory service by the use of twine made from cotton as it can by the use of twine made from jute. If it is found that the use of cotton is as satisfactory and can be obtained at or about the same cost it is impossible for me to understand why the Post Office Department should not use cotton twine instead of insisting upon using a foreign commodity. However, if it is found from the experiment that the use of twine made from jute is cheaper and the Department can, by its use, render more efficient and satisfactory services, then I am sure the proponents of this amendment will not object to the use of jute twine in place of cotton, but until this is definitely established I think we are clearly justified in insisting that the products of American labor should be utilized in our governmental activities, and I trust, therefore, this amendment will pass.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, if this amendment should be carried on a 50-percent or a 25-percent basis, it should be carried on a 100-percent basis. In other words, if the amendment has any merit, if the argument is that it protects the American cotton farmer, then he should have full protection. There should be no compromise about it. But there is a principle involved here. This is not the proper way to legislate on this kind of a matter. We have two methods of controlling importation into the United States. One is the tariff and the other is the reciprocal-trade agreements. Why violate both of these principles?

We are starting on a proposition that is new, and the cotton farmer ought not to ask it. There is not enough involved financially to warrant this departure. If they are entitled to part of twine they ought to have all of it, but they ought to go after it through a tariff which is the orderly way to accomplish what they desire. They are afraid to do that. They are free-traders theoretically but they want protection by special legislation. They are afraid to be protectionists as they should be, but they would like to have protection through the back door. I repeat that if this matter is going to be handled in a legislative way it should be handled as we have always handled similar matters. This House has already passed upon this proposition once before. This House has defeated this proposition. It goes to another body and that body tacks on something and sends it back here in a conference report and expects us to swallow it. Why should we under pressure accept what we deliberately rejected? I repeat that the cotton people should not insist on this. Why? I remember when the cotton people of this country produced 65 percent of the cotton produced in the world and exported 65 percent of what they produced, but they have come into a sorry situation. They have come into a sorry day because of tactics just like this. They have not approached the subject in the proper attitude. I am in favor of doing whatever is best for this great number of Americans who produce cotton. I think they ought to have every reasonable protection, but today the Government owns $650,000,000 worth of cotton and we are selling it back to the cotton farmer under a subterfuge. We bought it from them and now are selling it back to them at the loss of many millions to the Government and the farmers cannot use it even when this Government gives them this advantage. They come here today with this little matter that will probably not amount to 25 cents to each cotton farmer in the South. It would not mean anything except it is a gesture which carries serious implications. It is a little subterfuge. Next year they will increase the percentage or provide that all the twine be constructed from cotton. It will be another subsidy where the Post Office Department will be paying about twice the present price for twine. I repeat, who is going to pay for this? It is the industries in the northern part of the United States. Industries that are already equipped in my State and other States to make this sort of twine. What will be the result? Next year we will raise this from 25 to 50 percent, and we will start on a new process of legislation and the result will be more industries moving to the Southland. Let us do something worth while for the cotton farmers and retain the legislative principles that have made our country great. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I want to say to you that I have had the privilege of serving in Congress over 18 years. I have the distinct honor of having served in the lower House of Congress longer than any man from South Carolina during this past 150 years. During my first term in Congress I entered into this line of work of trying to protect Americans from imports from India and other countries so that we might be able to consume the products of the American people. The remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS]—and he is a good friend of mine—are in line with every speech that has been made over the years in connection with this matter. They do not want us to get in with a start with cotton in replacing jute.

Now, I want to call this to your attention: We have at this time 13,000,000 bales of surplus cotton, 11,000,000 of which is stored with the Federal Government, costing annually $45,000,000 for storage thereon. What are the facts in connection with jute? Annually they are importing into this country 2,000,000,000 pounds of jute, either in raw state or in manufactured products. Pound for pound, if we had our own markets, we would use 2,000,000 bales of perfectly good American cotton.

Mr. Speaker, unless something is done to restore the cotton industry of this country, drastic readjustments must take place in the South. This is not only the South's problem, it is the problem of every section of the country and every citizen, regardless of what line of business he or she may be engaged in. Unless something is done to restore the cotton industry it will be impossible to bring back that type of recovery we ought to have. From day to day we hear Congressmen standing upon the floor of the House talking about America for Americans, yet in the meantime we permit the jute interests of India, a possession of Great Britain, to ship into this country millions and millions of dollars' worth of jute to the extent that as stated it displaces 2,000,000 bales of American cotton, taking our own markets away from our own people, which is destroying the purchasing power of the South. Mr. Speaker, let us stop quibbling about this question and do what we should have done years ago—that is, help the cotton industry of the South, or our people will be forced to go into dairying, hog raising, and the cattle business in competition with other sections. Please remember it can be done and will be done if we do not promptly and properly solve the cotton problem. Then what will become of these other great sections of the country?

I hope we will adopt this amendment and get started on doing that which we should have done years ago. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS].

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, "Tain't no disgrace to run when you is scared."

I am so amused by the opposing debaters. One says this matter is so large as to mean the destruction of a great industry. The next, that it is too trivial to notice. Another would have us believe that it would mean starvation for 600 citizens. The next gentleman rises and solemnly assures us that this is a mere bagatelle, that it amounts to thirty-three ten-thousandths of 1 percent of the average cotton crop; in other words, that it involves only 6,000 bales—and that is true and the Member is exactly right. If he would follow his logic to its true and inevitable conclusion, he would vote for this amendment, because it does not affect materially the situation that now exists; but he will not do it because—though he be, and he is, honest—he is scared. Every one of these gentlemen who rise and shout to high heaven against this amendment are afraid of the absurdity they are seeking to defend. They know that if they give cotton a chance to compete with jute twine in the Postal Service, it will win its way into even the closed minds of some of the hardened bureaucrats who have opposed its introduction, and they know it will win its way into the confidence and favor of the Post Office Department employees by sheer merit. They know that there is nothing to their argument that the use of cotton would cost more. The same amount of money spent for cotton twine will tie more bundles and packages than if it were spent for jute; and cotton twine is a far better and more serviceable product, yet they insist, for no reason under God's blue dome, upon retaining a foreign product when they might use—with very little, if any, need of adjustment in their machinery and none at all in their personnel set-up—American cotton.

And so I beg of our friends from New England, those gentlemen on the Republican side of the aisle, to come clean and give us a break by standing up to their own traditions. Their cry through all these years has been for a protective tariff to exclude foreign products. Of course, they have never meant it unless it feathered their own nests. They have never put a tariff on jute, because they can make more money by making an inferior jute twine and selling it for the equivalent price of a better cotton twine, and double their profit by leaving jute on the free list.

Whether we should put a tariff on jute is not a question at issue today. That argument is advanced now in an effort to throw this train off the track. If we were trying to levy a tariff on jute, the same gentlemen would be representing their same selfish constituencies, and claiming that another means should be employed. No matter what may be proposed to aid cotton, they will oppose it.

So be not misled by their prophecies of disastrous consequences nor by their attempts to laugh us out of court. Give cotton a chance to prove its superior quality and worth in the acid test of actual comparison on the same job. It will convince the most skeptical that it is not only the best twine for postal use but also the cheapest in the long run. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GERLACH].

Mr. GERLACH. Mr. Speaker, the industry which manufactures the jute twine used by the Post Office Department is located in my district. I have studied this question and find what it means to the cotton industry: The use of only 1,250 additional bales on a 25-percent basis, or 2,500 bales on a 50-percent basis. At the present time in my district more than 7,000 persons are on direct or W. P. A. relief. Should this amendment pass, more than 300 persons will be thrown out of private employment and forced to go on the relief rolls in the city of Allentown.

Previous speakers have told you that 600 people were employed in making jute twine but that they were employed on other lines of work as well, which is not a fact. The people working in this industry in the city of Allentown manufacturing jute work on jute exclusively.

Now, just a few words as to what jute means to the United States and to the cotton growers of the South. The United States purchases directly and indirectly from one-quarter to one-third of all the jute and jute products exported from India. This amounts to $78,000,000 per year. India purchases directly and indirectly from the United States a yearly average of $87,000,000 worth of American products. India consumes one-third of the cotton goods from England, our second-best customer for raw cotton. Bengal, India, the province which produces jute, takes 40 percent of all the cotton goods imported into India. In conclusion let me ask my southern colleagues, who are supporting this amendment, why the cotton producers in the South use jute to wrap and tie their bales of raw cotton.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, to me it is an amazing performance to find my friends from Massachusetts, the home of protection, the State that perhaps has profited more from the application of the Buy American Act than any other, leading the fight against this pittance to the cotton farmer who in the nature of things can have no part in any protective system. What a strange and cruel philosophy.

The man who invented the tariff system would not have advocated any such action. Read the Report on Manufactures, written by Alexander Hamilton in the early years of our national life. He said, when he advocated protection for manufactures, that, in order to do justice to the farmer, on some commodities there should be protection where they could be protected, and where they could not there should be an export bounty.

We are faced here with the same situation as the boy who was eating an apple in the presence of his playmate, and who, when he was asked for the core, stated, "There ain't going to be no core."

I can understand why these Members who have manufacturing plants in their districts would have to say something; but to the Member, Democratic or Republican, who is willing to face facts and see that justice is done, I do not see how he can do anything other than vote for this amendment.

I have sat in this House and listened to the speeches when two great tariff bills were enacted.

The story, the argument, the whole basis of the discussion was "Buy American." Now, I ask my friends from Massachusetts and Pennsylvania if it is fair to urge the consumers and the southern farmers to buy American and then to say, "But give us the privilege of buying in India, where they pay 16 cents a day for labor"?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am in favor of buying American. Instead of trying to convince Members of this House, the gentleman had better try to convince his party.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am not interested in getting off into some other discussion in the brief time I have.

Mr. Speaker, last year jute and jute products, valued at $40,000,000, produced by 16-cent labor, were brought into America.

Down in the South they pick cotton in the blazing sun. We have recently enacted a law which forces industry in that area to pay a minimum wage. I voted for that measure. To vote in this House on the basis of "Buy American," and then to have the manufacturing districts that throughout these years have enjoyed the benefits of protection urge that not even 25 percent shall be used to purchase in America the twine that is used in the Post Office Department is a rank absurdity.

Practically all of the mercantile establishments in the Nation use cotton twine or cordage for wrapping. It would seem strange if the Post Office Department could not use it as well.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER].

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I am neither interested in this proposition from the standpoint of my district nor from any sectional viewpoint; but I do take the floor to assist a colleague who has an industry manufacturing this jute twine. I can candidly state, based on 10 years' experience in railway-mail cars, trying to catch a pouch within a mile of where you took the last one on and put one off, that the efficacy of the jute twine has always proven itself far superior to any cotton twine I ever heard of or used.

This jute I always understood came from the Philippines, although I am not familiar with that fact. I did not even know where it was manufactured. Last year when it came to the letting of the contract, I was approached by my good friend from Allentown, Mr. Fry, and I went down to the Post Office Department and discussed it with them. There I found the purchasing agent had similar experience in the classified service that I had and he also knew the efficacy of the jute twine and its superiority over any cotton twine.

Mr. PACE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSER. In a moment. I know what the gentleman is going to ask me and I will yield in a moment.

We always found that the cotton twine was a twine that because of its weave and twist did not render itself adaptable to the touch of the fingers in assembling and quickly tying up packages of mail and throwing that mail into a pouch.

The jute twine does render itself adaptable to the touch of the fingers and permits of rapid tying of the packages without causing the snarl in the twine that cotton twine does. The cotton twine we get from the folding room does that repeatedly when I use it in my office. I understand the gentleman from Georgia has a twine that he showed here sometime ago. I am sorry I did not see it, but I wish we could have 15 or 20 packages of letters that I could try to tie with that cotton twine. The jute twine does not tangle.

Mr. PACE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. If the Bureau of Standards of the United States and the Post Office Department says this twine is as good or superior to jute twine, would the gentleman have any objection to it? The second question is, How did the gentleman compare jute twine with cotton twine when the Post Office Department did not use any cotton twine?

Mr. MOSER. The Post Office Department did buy cotton twine during the time I was in the classified service and that particular cotton twine had a twisted woven covering and we finally used it for shoestrings. Regardless of Bureau of Standards or Post Office Department reports I would personally wish to make a practical test.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the remainder of the time.

May I say first that the Committee on Appropriations does not belong to the Cotton Belt, and it does not belong to the Jute Belt, and it holds no brief for cotton and it holds no brief for jute; but this question has been before the country for a long time and in this effort to bring about an adjustment we have tried to be fair and considerate to all interests. It was our thought it would be a fair proposition that a provision be written into this bill requiring that 25 percent of the appropriation be used to purchase cotton twine. Cotton is an American product, whereas jute is a foreign product. In the fiscal year 1938 the Post Office Department bought 2,146,005 pounds of jute twine and only 11,194 pounds of the domestic product. This provision, if it is written into the law, will give the Post Office Department ample time and ample facilities to test this question and reach a decision that will be in the interest of all concerned. It was our thought that it would be fair to all interests to have this test made.

With that statement I should like to close the debate and to say that we submit this question to the judgment of the House on the evidence that has been presented.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOPER). The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LUDLOW and Mr. PACE) there were—ayes 94, noes 69.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 196, nays 144, not voting 90, as follows:
